For a few years when he first arrived, Sam shuffled between Yorkton, Sask., where he worked as a store clerk, and Winnipeg, where he worked in a factory, stitching mens' pants. After he married his "bashert" Millie, he decided to join Joe in Windsor.

The brothers started up separate grocery stores, with the same name, Ford Provision, "so we could advertise together," says Sam.

They both became active in the city's Jewish community. Joe is one of the original members of the Shaar Shomayim synagogue and past president of the congregation. In fact, Joe and Sophie were the very first couple to be married there.

Years later, as Joe and Sam became increasingly frustrated watching young boys discontinue their religious commitment after their bar mitzvahs were over, they started up a club called the Tefillin Club to encourage them to stay involved.

"We gave them a nice breakfast, took them to ball games – bribed them actually – and they learned," Sam says. At its peak, the Tefillin Club had 50 members.

But that was then. In the years since, community involvement has dwindled remarkably. This, say the brothers, is unfortunate.

"Sometimes we come in the morning to shul and there are only three or four people here, not even a minyan," Joe says. "We are losing a lot of members. It's too bad."

Yet Joe and Sam can always be counted on to join a minyan if they are needed, says Shaar Shomayim's cantor of eight years, David Neumark.

"The Cohens are held in high regard in the community, but if you're looking for their single, most significant contribution – that's it," Neumark says.

Four years ago, Joe broke his hip and needed surgery, but has since made a remarkable recovery.

Sam had bypass surgery when he was 85, he has had cancer of the bowel and he receives regular blood transfusions. But he, too, seems much younger than his 95 years.

"We always say, 'he has nine lives,'" says Sam's daughter Janet Rosenbaum, 64, a former professor of nursing at the University of Windsor.

Joe and Sam each have two children, several grandchildren and great-grandchildren with whom they remain close. But, as their children say, Joe and Sam's relationship is unique.

"They have a very special bond," Janet says. "It's funny, sometimes I feel like we switch roles. When I go for a walk with my dad, I hold onto him, but when he walks with my Uncle Joe, he holds onto my dad!"

Though their families bring them care packages regularly, both brothers still love to cook for each other despite their age. Brisket, hamburgers, meatloaf and perogies are some of Sam's specialties.

"Joe eats everything, but I am very particular," Sam says.

"Sam talks more than I do," Joe shoots back.

It's comforting, if at times strange for their children that even at their age, Joe and Sam never stop being "parents."

At 71, Morry sometimes still feels like a little boy.

"Every night at nine o'clock when he gets home from Sam's, my dad calls me to say 'good night,'" he laughs. "He keeps me young."

The Cohen brothers have always been close, but have become even more so since their wives passed away.

"My dad was devastated when my mother died," Morry says. "But he still talks to her. He wakes up every morning and says, 'Good Morning, Sophie.' 'I'm having eggs for breakfast, Sophie.' When he goes to shul, he puts his hand on her plaque and wishes her a good Shabbat."

"Look at her picture," Sam beams, pointing to the wall of his apartment, filled with photos and portraits of his family. "Isn't she beautiful?"

Last year, Windsor's Jewish community came out to celebrate Joe's 100th birthday at the synagogue. Even Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray made an appearance.

"Everybody wants to know what's the secret to a long life," says Joe. "So, I'll tell you. Write it down. 'You choose for yourself the life that you want to live. Choose your path. Then don't worry so much.'"

Richler was proud of Jewish heritage: Steinberg

King said Richler seemed to sometimes go out of his way to offend.

"I remember he spoke at an important community function years ago where there were two head tables. The theme of his talk was how ridiculous head tables were. That angered many people for whom being at the head table was important."

King thinks Richler, in his writing, was "bluntly realistic" but sometimes "deliberately provocative," veering into areas that "smacked of anti-Semitism"in an attempt to "titillate."

Friend and drinking buddy Irwin Steinberg explained that Richler actually "just had little patience with the pretensions of certain people."

Steinberg said Richler was very proud of his Jewish heritage and cared about the community. He believes Richler had a high ethical standard that stemmed from his family's rabbinical background and that he expected people to live up to the Jewish teachings he was raised with.

Barbara Kay, former president of the Jewish Public Library and Jewish Book Month chair, admitted she had mixed feelings about Richler for many years, but in the end thought of him with affection and recognized his greatness.

"I've loved him and hated him at times," said Kay, an avid Richler reader. "I used to feel he was motivated less by the satirical impulse than by a personal need to exact revenge on his community… He didn't seem to have the detachment for great literary achievement."

Kay found the "venom and vitriol" in Solomon Gursky Was Here especially "gratuitous" in portraying the community, yet she loved The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, despite the stereotypical anti-hero.

"I appreciated him more when he changed the target of his attacks to the Quebec nationalists, but even then I sort of winced," she said.

His last major novel, Barney's Version, was his "most mature" work, she said, and came to represent the author's own "mellowing."

"I felt a tremendous pang when I heard he died… In the end, I had come to think of him as someone in the family, someone who could be exasperating, but whose loss has diminished us."

Retired Concordia University English literature professor Mervin Butovsky thinks those who regard Richler as anti-Semitic are "silly."

"His writing comprises the epoch of the immigrant Jews in Montreal. It is the story of how we came to be who we are and the process by which we came to the identity we now have."

Richler, he said, was an astute observer of how these "uncultured people, with rough exteriors, caught up in a world that largely rejected them, slowly made it to positions of comfort and often power… His characters embody the tensions of his generation as it moved from traditional Jewish life to what North America had to offer."

Butovsky, who believes St. Urbain's Horseman was Richler's best, thinks that in his last years the author was trying to reconcile with the Jewish community.

He recalled a lecture Richler gave at McGill University 1½ years ago, sponsored by the Jewish studies program, in which he spoke "without bombast or barbs or insults.

"He looked back with deep feeling at his past and how he had made his life, alluding to the trials he had suffered in separating himself from the community."

Norman Ravvin, director of Concordia's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies, said his impression was also that Richler was "performing more carefully" during that talk than usual. He compared Richler to American novelist Philip Roth who also broke ground depicting Jewish life "honestly, if not politely," without fear of what anyone would think.

"Richler was taking risks in his writing that the community in the '50s and '60s was not ready to take," Ravvin said. "Like Roth, Richler paid the price."

But in recent years, he said, Richler's reputation as a "bad boy" was fading. With the publication of the scathing non-fiction work Oh Canada! Oh Quebec! almost 10 years ago, Richler found new respect among his previous critics in the Jewish community because his political views concurred with their own.

The most serious schism between Richler and the organized Jewish community came following his scathing 1991 article in the New Yorker in which he excoriated Quebec nationalists and left the impression that their attitude to Jews had changed little since the 1930s.

Richler was infuriated when Canadian Jewish Congress, in response to the clamour from offended francophones, responded that he was overstating the case and that today's nationalists should not be equated with the rabid followers of Lionel Groulx decades ago. Richler dismissed CJC as "court Jews."

Frank Schlesinger, then chair of CJC's community relations committee, recalled a four-hour lunch he and three other CJC officials had with the author. By the end, the best that could be said was the two sides "agreed to disagree."

"Richler went ballistic," Schlesinger said. "He said how dare we condemn him or tell him what he had a right to say. But we had not done that. CJC was besieged by French Quebecers wanting to know if we agreed with the New Yorker article. There was a perception he was speaking for the Jewish community. To be silent would have appeared to be endorsing his views. We did believe that, though anti-Semitism still existed, Quebec had evolved a great deal since the '30s and '40s. It's a shame it had to be such a nasty exchange."

In retrospect, though, Schlesinger said that perhaps this public airing was "healthy" because it forced Quebecers to look at their past and stimulated debate.

As for Richler's fiction, Schlesinger counts himself as a fan.

"He was not shy about criticizing everybody, including Jews. But there is no question he was a great author and put the Montreal Jewish community on the world stage. A lot of those who criticize him did not read what he wrote.

"He was just too abrasive to be embraced as 'a son of the Jewish community.'"

Jack Jedwab, who was also at that marathon meal, said he liked Richler a lot more afterward than before, even though Richler called him a "flack."

"I left with the impression he was a very decent person," Jedwab said. "He told us he did it [the article] for the community. He knew the frustration a lot felt at seeing the community decline. It saddens me thinking about it now."

The official tribute from CJC was polite; Richler is praised as a great Canadian and literary figure:

"Mordecai Richler was in his own way a true egalitarian; no one, including himself, was spared his sardonic wit and his brilliant acerbic humour. His unique portrait of immigrant society and Canadian Jewry is an enduring literary legacy to the world.

"His fearless portrayals of various sectors of society were driven by an intense passion and love for Montreal, Quebec and Canada."

Fireworks expected in Durban

B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights (and chair of a national advisory committee to Fry), and Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

While Mock is hopeful that the harsh language relating to Israel will be struck or deferred before the conference starts, Landy feels it will make it to Durban.

"There's general skepticism that it will be defeated before the conference," said Landy, who had just returned from a conference in London called by Israel's deputy foreign minister, Michael Melchior, to discuss the proposals. "I think it will make it to the conference agenda, and there's a better chance [it will be defeated] by hard bargaining at the last minute."

Mock said the language of the draft is almost unchanged from the inflammatory rhetoric that emanated from the Asian regional prepcom held in Tehran earlier this year. The wording on Zionism especially "is outrageous. I can't imagine they would allow such language to stay in. We will work very hard to lobby states to see to it that it's removed.

"I'm going to remain optimistic that we have a strong enough lobby to remove some of the most contentious language in Geneva."

Mock said past prepcoms have tried to achieve consensus among interested parties, failing which individual resolutions may be "bracketed," meaning they will still be up for negotiation in Durban.

Over the past few weeks, Mock has distributed to UN member states and NGOs (non-governmental organizations) a detailed paper that explores popular misconceptions about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, authored by Canadian human rights expert David Matas. Mock was also instrumental in forming a so-called Jewish caucus, comprised of a dozen Jewish NGOs from Canada, Europe and the United States. In a recent statement, the caucus warned that including anti-Israel rhetoric in any document endorsed by the Durban conference "would be a tremendous blow to the anti-racism cause."

The following draft clauses, which came out of the last prepcom in Geneva, held May 21 to June 1, relate to Israel and Zionism, as reported in the July 4 Jerusalem Post:

- Clause 25, listed in a section titled "Ethnic cleansing, genocide, slavery, and similar crimes," reads: "We affirm that a foreign occupation founded on settlements, its laws based on racial discrimination, with the aim of continuing domination on the occupied territory, as well as its practices, which consist of reinforcing a total military blockade, isolating towns, cities, and villages under occupation from each other, totally contradict the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and constitute a serious violation of international human rights and humanitarian law, a new kind of apartheid, a crime against humanity and a serious threat to international peace and security."
- Clause 29, in a section entitled "Victims of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia, and related intolerance," refers to the Holocaust and to "ethnic cleansing of the Arab population in historic Palestine." There are also references to "racial discrimination against the Palestinians as well as other inhabitants of the Arab occupied territories" and a call for the cessation of such practices.
- Clause 55 reflects concern at the worldwide increase in anti-Semitism and "the increase of racist practices of Zionism… as well as the emergence of racial and violent movements based on racism and discriminatory ideas, in particular, the Zionist movement, which is based on racial superiority."

UN Conference on Racism

Landy, who was joined by 60 Jewish leaders from around the world at the meeting called by Melchior to discuss the draft resolutions and how to lobby against them, was hesitant to call on Canada to boycott the Durban conference.

"It depends on how outrageous the final declaration will be. If the language is so bad as to make a mockery of the conference, then we would want Canada to leave. It's important for us to be there, but there may be an advantage to walking away once we're there."

The United States has said it would boycott the conference if it descended into a polemic against Israel. In March, Canada said boycotting was an option. While Ottawa is not discounting a boycott, it is now hinting that attending is preferable.

"While we believe that engagement is the correct approach in most instances, we will decide on the form and level of Canadian participation once we have a clear understanding of what the conference's outcomes might be," foreign affairs spokesperson Michael O'Shaughnessy told The CJN.

Canada, he said, "will continue to participate in UN preparatory meetings and work towards a forward-looking global commitment to eradicating the scourges of racism and racial discrimination."

As for the anti-Zionist clauses, Canada, in past prepcoms, has "strongly maintained its position that any linkages between Zionism and racism are unacceptable. Canada has been supporting language that would clearly identify and condemn both anti-Semitism and Islamophobia as racism."

Hamilton synagogue becomes earth-friendly

By JULIA KOLLEK
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — A Hamilton synagogue has taken an earth-friendly step this summer. Temple Anshe Sholom has decided to stop spraying chemicals on its gardens and to instead use alternative measures to keep the grounds looking attractive.

Norm Weddum, board president, says that for many years the temple hired a commercial garden company to use fertilizer, herbicides and pesticides. The board asked for a report on pesticide use to be drawn up after a parent complained.

"There are three schools using the temple," Weddum says. "The temple supplementary school, a preschool and a day school, and as we know, children prefer running across a lawn to walking on the path. There were valid concerns raised, and we did not want to take the chance of having our kids exposed to any unnecessary health risks."

This is not the first time the temple has looked at environmental issues. About three years ago, a study was conducted on the cleaning products and even the type of toilet paper being used. As a result, foam cups were no longer bought for meetings and functions – paper cups or the temple's own crockery were used instead. And while keeping an eye on costs, the temple considered eco-friendly cleaning products available on the market.

To find out more about the effect of using lawn chemicals, two of the temple's committees, the lawn and garden and the social action committee, were asked to prepare a report to the board.

Sari Ackerman was one of the members involved in planning the research. Despite the fact that she is a committed environmentalist, Ackerman stresses that the group was careful to present an objective report.

"There were several steps in our report," she says. "The first part was to find out what exactly was being used on the lawn. It was treated four times a year using fairly standard chemicals. These included a urea-based fertilizer, herbicides such as 24D and Par3 to deal with dandelions and crabgrass, and Diazinon was sprayed if needed to control slugs and insects."

As Ackerman and her team discovered, all these chemicals are legal for use in Canada, as stated in the Pest Control Act. The chemicals were being sprayed by a licensed company "and we had to assume they were being used in accordance with manufacturer's recommendations."

Ackerman began looking critically into the product-testing process. She found that tests conducted by the chemical manufacturers themselves focused only on the active ingredient. Each chemical was tested individually, so the combined effect of bringing several together – the reality on the ground – was not studied. Recommended levels for use were measured for safe exposure to healthy adult males – not children.

The temple's research also found that the Canadian medical community has voiced concern over the effect of pesticides on children's health, and that there has been a call for more independent research to be carried out. As children are smaller and lower to the ground, they are more exposed to breathing in garden chemicals that could result in respiratory problems.

Other general concerns were that with underdeveloped nervous and immune systems, children may be more vulnerable to chemical exposure.

In addition, Ackerman says, "We needed to ask ourselves whether our current actions were consistent with Judaic tradition. The next step was to find Jewish sources to look at our relationship with the land."

The final step of the research was to see what was happening in schools and public parks in the region. Ackerman found that the municipality had stopped spraying several years ago because of health concerns, legal liability and cost. Grassy areas were simply cut. The same was true for grounds at cemeteries.

"With all this, the big question in my mind was were we going to find a viable alternative?" Ackerman says.

"The benefits of spraying had been a beautiful appearance and the cost was reasonable – only $300 for the season. It was labour-saving; were people going to be willing to dig up any weeds we found?"

The alternative route was to look at prevention rather than intervention. If the soil could be nourished and a strong healthy lawn created to compete with the weeds, there would be no need to spray. The report included gardening suggestions, such as optimum watering times, the need for lawn aeration and the advantage of over-seeding if necessary.

When the report was finally presented, the decision to stop spraying was unanimously accepted, and discussion extended to the maintenance of the temple cemetery in a separate part of the city where the property is still chemically treated.

Ackerman and her team were pleased with the response.

"I think the board was ready to make that commitment," Ackerman says. "One board member even offered to pay the difference if the switch was going to cost more. But in the end, the cost will be about the same."

Now gardeners come once a week to cut the grass and check the grounds.

"It's great not to smell the chemicals and to see kids running across the lawn, and not be worrying about health risks."

Struggle for the Alliance's soul

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Perception in politics not only shapes reality, it is reality. Even hardened political pundits have to sit back and watch in wonder as two competing perceptions fight for support in the struggle for the very soul of the Canadian Alliance. Let me explain this latest saga of the "one hand and the other."

Fifteen months ago or so, Reformers realized that they could not wrest power away from the Liberals unless the party somehow packaged itself in a way that could attract serious support in the one province that serves as home to one-in-three Canadians… Ontario. For some Reformers, that realization went one step further. Preston Manning, the super-bright but distant politician who simply could not connect with people who favoured penny-loafers over cowboy boots, had to be replaced with a more accessible face.

Thus was born the Canadian Alliance and its new-found, photogenic, energetic, quasi-bilingual leader, Stockwell Day.

Master politician that he is, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien was virtually alone in recognizing the acute vulnerability of the fledgling party and its unseasoned leader. So, against all advice – and conventional wisdom – he called an election and overwhelmed the opposition.

Day never had a chance. His inexperienced team and his own unfamiliarity with the nuances of federal politics prevented him from ever hitting his stride – both during and since the election. Nor did the passive-aggressive attitude of the Manning loyalists within caucus help the cause. It is almost as if Day's "obituary" notice was prepared on the same day as the announcement of his birth as leader of the Alliance. Seen in this light, it is hard not to feel some compassion for the man.

Now shift the camera to Deborah Grey's recent media conference where she formally broke with the Alliance caucus. This courageous school teacher, who became involved in politics twelve years ago only because she felt that her hopes and interests were being ignored, endured the loneliness of being the sole Reform Party MP for years. She saw the party grow in popularity and its agenda of fiscal responsibility become the universal battle-cry (even of the ruling Liberals). She saw the need to reach out to the eastern half of the country and gamely accepted the democratic process that denied her mentor and political "father," Manning, the leadership of the vehicle that could help him realize the populist dream.

But Grey also saw a bunch of superficial "Johnny-come-lately's" fritter away their chances, rob the party of any credibility and betray the principles of openness and democracy within caucus. In her mind, she did not leave caucus; the caucus left her.

So who's got it right? In the next issue of The CJN, I'll try to answer that question… as disturbing as the answer may be.

Senator dead at 84

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sidney Labe Buckwold, Saskatoon's first and only Jewish mayor, was also Western Canada's first Jewish senator.

Having acquired a taste for community service as a student in the Young Judaea movement (where he met his wife Clarice), Buckwold went on to take an active role in the Jewish and general community. He died June 27 of a heart attack at Royal University Hospital in Saskatoon. He was 84.

The son of Russian immigrants, Buckwold was born in Winnipeg and raised in Saskatoon. After graduating from McGill University with a Bachelor of Commerce degree in 1936, he joined the family business, Buckwold's Limited, a wholesale drygoods distributing firm that is now a six-city floor covering business run by his two nephews. During World War II, he served in the Royal Canadian Army, attaining the rank of captain.

Buckwold remained active in the family business following his retirement in 1991 after 20 years as a senator, during which time he commuted weekly to Ottawa. The afternoon before his death, he played golf with a friend.

His political career dates back to 1953 when he was elected an alderman. He served as Saskatoon mayor for 11 years, from 1958 to 1963 and 1967 to 1971.

As a senator, Buckwold's service included stints as chair of the Canadian National Committee of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements, co-chair of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service, and Government Whip.

Among his many voluntary positions, Buckwold served as regional chair of the Zionist Organization of Canada, president of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, chairman of the board of St. Paul's Hospital, and as a director of many large Canadian companies. He was also a Negev Dinner honoree.

"He was definitely a figure in the Jewish community," said Buckwold's son-in-law Arnie Shaw, speaking last week from Saskatoon, which has a Jewish community of about 150 families.

"He was very instrumental in 1967, raising funds for the Six-Day War campaign. He was involved in the building of the [Agudas Israel] synagogue where it's currently located, and was honorary vice-president until his passing."

Among the numerous honours listed in his biography, Buckwold was installed as an officer of the Order of Canada in 1995 and named as an "honorary Indian chief" for his role in bringing the 1971 Canada Winter Games to Saskatoon.

In eulogies at his funeral, family members recalled Buckwold's sense of humour, devotion to his family, and skill as a storyteller and public speaker (evident in his youth on school and Young Judaean debating teams).

Buckwold is survived by Clarice, his wife of 61 years; son Jay and daughter Judy Baillie, both of Vancouver, and daughter Linda Shaw of Saskatoon; and five grandchildren. He was predeceased by his two brothers Alvin and Seymour.

Schroeder tells Sharon he won't buck EU policy

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon arrived in Paris last Thursday night for meetings with French President Jacques Chirac, after spending the first part of the day in Germany in meetings with German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder.

Sharon also visited the infamous Track 17 of Grunewald Station, a former freight depot where more than 50,000 Berlin Jews were loaded on deportation trains during World War II. Nearly all died in Nazi death camps.

At a joint press conference, Sharon called Germany's positions on the Middle East "balanced," and indicated he would accept German diplomatic efforts in the region, but Schroeder quickly noted that Berlin has to stick to the agreed-upon European Union policies.

Sharon made the brief trip to Germany and France as part of what he called a public-relations campaign to convey Israel's position and to seek European pressure on Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat to enforce a ceasefire.

At the joint press conference, Schroeder and Sharon were friendly, but clearly differed on a number of issues. The German chancellor said that it was time to start implementing the Mitchell Committee report, saying that "we emphasized that this is the time to start the first stage."

Sharon, on the other hand, demanded "a total halt to all the terror actions, the violence and the incitement" before beginning a countdown to the start of the Mitchell framework.

At the end of the press conference, which followed the working session, Schroeder said that Germany wants to see more "flexibility" by Israel on the settlement issue, which did not come up in their working session.

That session was devoted in large part to discussions about German efforts to help arrange a prisoner swap that would free at least three kidnapped Israeli soldiers in the hands of the Hezbollah, and dozens of Lebanese held by Israel.

But on the crisis with the Palestinians, Sharon stuck to his demands of Arafat.

"It's not up to us to pick the leader of the Palestinian Authority, but there is a problem with his behaviour, which has to change, of manipulations and maneuverings. Arafat has not ceased the incitement and did not order terror suspects arrested. Pressure has to be applied on him, isolating him, which is the only way he will act against terror."

He called on European leaders to "stop dancing around Arafat," but he also denied a report last week in Ma'ariv that he had ordered the army to prepare to topple Arafat through military means.

When Schroeder asked Sharon, "When will you know when it's quiet?", Sharon answered with the same reply he gave U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell: "When a mortar is fired, you hear it. Yesterday [last Wednesday] there were 58 hand grenades thrown. That's also visible."

Schroeder also asked about a mechanism for an observer force to supervise the ceasefire. Sharon explained there are contacts between the commanders on the ground and there is a security co-ordination committee that includes the Americans. "But we oppose international observers," he said.

Sharon also warned Germany about the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction in the hands of Iran and Iraq, and he attacked Syrian President Bashar Assad for his recent anti-Semitic comments to the Pope.

At the old train platform, now a Holocaust memorial in Berlin, Sharon said that "Israel's right to self-defence is a great right and a great duty flowing from the death of 6 million Jews in the Holocaust. This is the right of the Jewish people."

Sharon also met with Belgian Foreign Minister Louis Michel, whose country holds the European Union presidency for the next six months. Sharon had cancelled a planned stop in Brussels, because of a war crimes investigation there related to the massacre of Palestinians at the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps in 1982.

Michel told Sharon that his government is "embarrassed" by the investigation, and said that the Belgian prime minister would like to visit Israel to explain the matter. Sharon said the prime minister would be welcome.

"The investigation is a problem of justice and not a problem of politics," Michel said before meeting Sharon.

Michel also offered Sharon EU assistance in achieving stability and quiet in the region. Sharon said that Europe needs a balanced policy regarding the Middle East.

"Meanwhile," he added, "you can help with economic development and if you are interested in a peace process and stability, massive pressure on Arafat to stick to the ceasefire would help."

Later, Sharon said to reporters that while the EU in general is not balanced in its policies towards Israel, there are two European countries he thinks do have balanced positions on the Middle East – Germany and Britain.

Belgium to change human rights law

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BRUSSELS — Belgium plans to amend a controversial law that allows courts to prosecute foreign officials for human rights abuses committed abroad, said Johannes Thuy, a Justice Ministry spokesperson.

The law threatens to overburden Belgium's justice system and jeopardize its diplomacy, said Thuy.

The revised law would contain a "filter" to increase the threshold for applying the law to avoid "everybody prosecuting everybody," he said.

One option under consideration is suspending the admissibility of a complaint filed against a head of state, prime minister or government minister until after he or she leaves office, Thuy said.

The initiative comes after a Belgian judge opened an investigation of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for his alleged connection with massacres at Palestinian refugee camps in Lebanon in 1982.

Foreign Minister Louis Michel, who was in Berlin to represent the European Union (EU) in talks with Sharon last week, took the initiative to change the law.

"I didn't raise it. He raised it," Sharon said on his flight from Berlin to Paris.

"He said it had severely embarrassed them and they are trying to find a way to end the embarrassment."

Sharon reiterated an invitation to the EU's Belgian presidency to visit Israel in the coming months.

UN admits it has videotape of soldiers' kidnap

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer announced last week that United Nations officials acknowledged the existence of a videotape containing information on the kidnapping of three IDF soldiers by Hezbollah guerrillas at Har Dov on October 7, 2000.

Israeli security sources suspect the tape has scenes recorded immediately after the abduction. In a strongly worded letter, the government demanded that the UN immediately transfer it to Israel.

Israeli officials had insisted for months that the cassette existed, but the UN had adamantly rejected the claim. According to Ben-Eliezer, information about its existence was leaked from New York.

While it is still unclear what the recording contains, two pictures showing UN tow trucks removing two vehicles used by the Hezbollah guerrillas during the kidnapping were shown last week on both Israeli television news channels.

The pictures were acquired by Shlomi Afrayat, owner of Topline in Kiryat Shmona, who has worked for months to make contact with the persons responsible for the recording. Afrayat is not in possession of the original tape.

"The scene was taped 18 hours after the abduction of the three soldiers," said Timor Goksel, spokesman for UNIFIL (UN interim force in Lebanon) peacekeepers in south Lebanon.

"It contains footage of abandoned vehicles the Iran-backed Hezbollah guerrillas used in the attack," Goksel said. "Inside the vehicles, UN peacekeepers found UN insignia, uniforms and license plates along with weapons and explosives."

Ben-Eliezer said that for months the Ministries of Defence and Foreign Affairs insisted that a video recording existed. As recently as June 28, Ben-Eliezer told senior UN representative in the region, Terje Larsen, during their meeting that there was a tape. Larsen angrily insisted that there wasn't. The meeting was tense.

"On Friday [last week] the same senior representative [Larsen] called me and to my amazement said, 'There is a tape!' He was very apologetic. I told him, 'I am asking that this tape be sent to us,'" Ben-Eliezer said.

"The tape may shed light on the circumstances surrounding the incident [the abduction]," he added, referring to security service assessments that the same soldier also recorded scenes of the actual attack.

The UN position near the area of the attack is manned by members of the Indian battalion. UN officers and officials insisted that the soldiers at the position did not witness the attack because they took cover immediately after an anti-armour missile was fired at the IDF patrol vehicle. However, Israeli security officials suspect that the UN soldiers witnessed the attack and may have turned a blind eye to Hezbollah preparations to carry it out.

The Defence Minister adds that he sent a letter to UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, in co-ordination with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in which he asked that the cassette be sent to Israel.

He also said he told the families of the three soldiers about the tape. The families reacted with surprise and frustration, also demanding that the UN submit it to Israeli authorities.

UN sources insisted that Annan was unaware of the existence of the tape until recently. Nonetheless, a senior official at the Middle East desk of the UN spokesman's office refused to comment on Ben-Eliezer's request.

Diplomatic sources at the UN said that the issue of the tape is embarrassing for Annan. "For some time, and on all levels, the United Nations denied the existence of the tape, while Israel claimed that it existed," said one source. "Now it appears that there is a tape and it is not clear what is on it."

However, in recent meeting with Israeli leaders, including Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, the secretary general has expressed genuine concern regarding the fate of the four kidnapped Israelis, and promised to continue his efforts to get information regarding their condition and gain their release.

The condition of the soldiers is one of the details which Israeli security analysts hope to ascertain by close examination of the tape. Blood stains were found at the scene of the attack and in the destroyed IDF patrol car, suggesting that the three soldiers were injured during the raid. However, it is still uncertain what kind of injuries they sustained, and Hezbollah has refused to comment on their condition.

Arrow units practice on Syrian Scud launch

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A Syrian army exercise last week that included the launch of a Scud missile provided IDF anti-ballistic missile experts with the opportunity to test almost all aspects of the Arrow anti-ballistic missile defence system using the Green Pine radar system.

According to IDF sources, the Green Pine radar system detected the Syrian launch from the time the Scud took off, and followed it on its 300-kilometre route until it landed in the Syrian desert. The sources likened the events to "almost real-time conditions" for testing the Arrow system – without actually launching the missile.

Green Pine was designed to pick up indications of missile launches from all over the Middle East, including Iraq and Iran. According to security sources, Green Pine has doubled the amount of early warning time to Israel in the event of a missile attack from three minutes to six.

While the Arrow was partially funded by the U.S., the Green Pine radar system, a huge 12-metre by four-metre panel carried on a truck, is Israeli made and financed. Development began at Elta in 1992, and in 1995, a first prototype was stationed experimentally at an air force base. Three Arrow launchers have been equipped with Green Pine radar systems. Recently, the Green Pine was presented outside Israel for the first time at the Paris Air Show. The system has been sold to India.

The Syrians have 260 ground-to-ground missiles and 44 launchers, according to the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies. Israeli sources say the Syrian missiles include Scud Bs, SS21s and Scud Cs. They are now trying to develop their own version of the Scud D, which would have a range of 700 kilometres.

Ron Arad was alive in '93: Syrian journalist

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Nizar Nayuf, the Syrian journalist and human rights activist who was recently released from prison after serving for nine years, has claimed that Israeli airman Ron Arad, missing since 1986, was alive until at least 1993.

"I have information about the fate of the Israeli navigator Arad, which confirms that he was alive from the moment his plane went down (in Lebanon) on October 16, 1986 until August 7, 1993," Nayuf told the London-based Al-Hayyat newspaper.

But Nayuf said he would not release the information until Israel frees "17 Syrians from the Golan who are being held in Israeli jails, and until it releases information on 600 Syrians captured during the 1967 and 1973 wars who were killed in the enemy's prisons."

A few days after his release from jail, Nayuf, 40, vowed he would release information that would compromise the Syrian leadership. Responding to the journalist's apparent intention to disclose details about Arad which he compiled before his arrest in 1992, Syrian's intelligence service re-arrested Nayuf two weeks ago. He was released 30 hours later.

Last month, as Syria's President Bashar Assad visited Paris, Nayuf claimed in the Lebanese newspaper A-Nahar that between 13,000 and 17,000 prisoners have died in Syrian jails and are buried in common graves in the desert.

Nayuf, who is partially paralyzed and vision-impaired, complained that the Syrian regime was stopping him from receiving medical treatment overseas. In Paris, Assad announced that the journalist can leave the country.

Groups prepare for Israel-bashing at UN conference

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The UN World Conference on Racism set for Durban, South Africa, in September is being billed as the most important human rights event of the year, but it is rapidly evolving into a world forum to blast Israel for racism, anti-Arabism and violating Palestinian human rights, according to Canadian parliamentarian Irwin Cotler, a leading international expert on human rights.

Cotler took part in an emergency meeting of 60 representatives from Jewish organizations and Israeli agencies – including deputy foreign minister Rabbi Michael Melchior – in London this week, under the auspices of the Jewish Board of Deputies. The meeting discussed how to deal with what Melchior called the "anti-Semitism in new clothes" the conference is expected to indulge in.

Drafts of resolutions prepared for the conference at preliminary planning sessions in Geneva and Tehran earlier this year depict Israel as a racist state that systematically discriminates against Arabs.

They call on Israel to repeal "laws based on racial discrimination, like the Law of Return and the policy of forceful occupation that prevents uprooted Palestinian refugees from returning to their homes and property," Cotler said.

"The draft resolutions emphasize the illegality of the settlements and depict Israel as a country where laws are based on racial discrimination aimed at continuing control over occupied territory … a violation of internationally recognized human rights… a new form of apartheid, a crime against humanity and a real threat to international peace and security."

Cotler said "advancing and protecting human rights is the new fashion that should be perceived as a new civic-secular religion that dictates policymakers in the West. If Israel is perceived as the absolutely evil violator of human rights, as the Palestinians and Muslim states are trying to do, Israel will end up the 'anti-Christ' of our age."

Noting that the old phraseology equating Zionism with racism failed among the anti-Israeli forces, Cotler said the new rhetoric makes use of catchwords that "hit the target of the moral positions of decision-makers in the West… For example, the connection between the loaded term 'occupation' and the term 'illegal' is a hint that Israel takes steps similar to those taken by the Nazis."

Cotler is particularly concerned because, he said, Israel has not done enough to counter Palestinian propaganda. "The Palestinians have exploited Israel's silence during diplomatic negotiations, to draft and distribute a grave indictment. While the Oslo process was proceeding apace, Israel was silent in the face of Palestinian declarations in international forums about harm done to Palestinians by Israel. That silence was interpreted in the world as an Israeli admission, and some basic truths about Israel and its rights as a democracy were undermined."

Cotler also warns that even if Israel ignores the Durban conference, the Belgian investigation into the viability of a legal proceeding against Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for his role in the Sabra and Shatilla massacres of 1982 "will be but the tip of the iceberg in the legal proceedings that could take place against Israel, let alone the harm that could be done to vital Israeli and Jewish interests."

Melchior admitted that Israel has not been prepared for the significance of developments in international law regarding human rights. "The government did not identify the significance of these developments and the ramifications that no government will be able to avoid.

"But that's changing, because now we understand we are in an existential struggle. They are trying to paint Israel as an enemy of human rights, as a the new apartheid state."

World Jewish Congress director Israel Singer, who also took part in the emergency session, said Israel and the Jewish communities would work together to present a "joint Jewish position and fight for our right to our rights. We certainly won't turn the other cheek."

CTV report 'romanticizes' Barghouti

On CTV's National News (July 1), the lead-in to a report about Barghouti stated that "Israeli intelligence is targeting Palestinian activists it holds responsible for attacks on Israeli civilians. CTV's Middle East correspondent Rodney Palmer spent the day with one man believed to be on the Israeli hit list."

The brief, introductory mention of "attacks on Israeli civilians" is the sole but inadequate reference to the tremendous violence that Israelis have endured at the hands of Palestinian "activists" like Barghouti. Palmer tells us that "the Israelis believe he's responsible for an armed militia," although it is a matter of record, not Israel's "belief," that Barghouti is the Fatah leader in the West Bank and head of the Tanzim, its armed militia.

Palmer gives no hint of the violence against Israelis and others that Barghouti has perpetrated. Nor is there any mention that Shin Bet security service has charged Barghouti with being personally responsible for the murder of a Greek Orthodox monk who was shot near Jerusalem on June 12, apparently mistaken for an Orthodox Jew. Barghouti, it is alleged, approved the murder and provided the weapons for it, although he has denied any involvement.

Palmer displays not even a trace of skepticism about Barghouti's role. There is no critical inquiry at all. For instance, Palmer reports that according to unnamed "Palestinian sources," 45 Fatah "activists" "have been assassinated since the beginning of the intifadah," while even the Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights claims the figure for all Palestinian factions is only about half that amount.

If anything, Palmer romanticizes the Fatah leader: "…he stays mobile, because a moving target is harder to hit. Even during the short time he spent with me, we had to suddenly change locations." Barghouti tells Palmer that the media help keep him alive by raising his profile, thereby forcing the Israelis "to be careful." Still, the correspondent notes, there's no guarantee "that Barghouti will not one day wind up like so many of his colleagues."

By contrast, in "The Martyr Strategy," which appeared in the New Yorker the next day, Jeffrey Goldberg presented Barghouti not as a mercilessly hunted activist, but rather as a militant rejectionist who consorts with terrorist leaders like Ahmed Jibril (of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine – General Command) and Hassan Yusuf, a Hamas chief.

Goldberg asked Barghouti what Israel would have to do to bring an end to the uprising. First, Barghouti answered, the Palestinians must get 100 percent of the West Bank, 100 percent of East Jerusalem and the "right of return" of the refugees. "Would that put an end to the conflict?" asked Goldberg. Apparently not. "Then we could talk about bigger things," Barghouti said, such as "one state for all the peoples," a concept already implied by Barghouti's reference to the "right of return." In short, no Israel at all.

Germany urged to crack down on extremists

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — A human rights and pro-democracy organization is urging Germany to combat what it calls the "serious problem" of a rising tide of anti-Semitic and racist violence.

In a report issued last Monday by its anti-racism committee, the Council of Europe, which is based in France and has 43 member states, called on Germany to toughen existing laws against hate crimes.

According to statistics provided by the German government through last December, there were some 15,591 extremist crimes last year – a 58.9 percent increase over the previous year.

Of those, there were 998 violent crimes, an increase of 33.8 percent over 1999. Among the violent crimes, 64 percent were aimed at foreigners.

The report rejected the frequent suggestion that the growth of such crimes is restricted to eastern Germany, for while the council's latest study says both eastern and western Germany have witnessed an increase in racist and anti-Semitic crimes, a recent European Union (EU) study suggested that hatred of immigrants is an especially serious problem among youth in eastern Germany, where economic problems, particularly unemployment, have been more marked than in the western portion of the nation.

As well, the EU study noted an increasing tendency throughout Europe to blame social and economic problems on minority groups.

The anti-racism committee also found fault with German media for spreading negative stereotypes about foreigners and minority groups.

While calling the rise in racism and anti-Semitic violence "one of the most pressing and dangerous expressions of racism and intolerance in Germany," the council commended the German government for changing its citizenship laws in January 2000.

As a result of that change, it is now easier for immigrants to become German citizens.

Members of the anti-racism committee visited Germany last October and met with government representatives and members of non-governmental organizations. The new report grew out of that visit.

Past reports have dealt with such issues as xenophobia in Austrian politics and the narrowing of British immigration laws.

The German government has not yet commented on the report.

'What ceasefire?'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The Mideast ceasefire, brokered by U.S. Central Intelligence Agency director George Tenet on June 13, is on the verge of disintegrating.

Mideast Analysis

Although there has been a fairly significant reduction of violence in the past month, nine Israelis and 13 Palestinians have been killed in more than 260 incidents since Israel and the Palestinian Authority agreed to the truce.

"What ceasefire?" asked Prime Minister Ariel Sharon contemptously last week.

Such is the situation that the United Nations' representative in the Middle East, Terje Roed Larsen, said recently that the ceasefire will "not hold." He is probably right. The tenuous truce was forced on Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat by the June 1 Islamic Jihad bombing in Tel Aviv which killed 21 Israelis.

Since then, Sharon has come under considerable pressure to abandon his policy of relative restraint and unleash the full might of the Israeli armed forces against the Palestinian Authority.

Israel has carried out small-scale reprisals to avenge Palestinian attacks, but for political reasons has refrained from hitting back harder.

Colin Powell, the U.S. secretary of state, wrapped up a visit to the region last week in an attempt to shore up the ceasefire, but his mission was essentially a failure.

He had hoped to set into motion a process whereby seven days of complete calm would be followed by a six-week cooling off period and by a subsequent confidence-building phase. But it appears this will not happen, at least for now.

The procedures for defusing the second intifadah are set out in the Mitchell report, which Israel and the PA have accepted. The Mitchell recommendations constitute a roadmap for the resumption of bilateral political negotiations, which ended last winter.

Such is the climate of mutual distrust that Israel and the Palestinians not only accuse each other of failing to fully comply with the ceasefire, but downplay the respective steps they have each taken to restore the status quo ante.

Israel believes that the PA has not fulfilled its obligations in halting terrorism, preventing attacks, arresting terrorists and stopping incitement. In fact, the PA has tolerated or initiated raids on Israelis in Areas B and C and refused to detain terrorists on Israel's most-wanted list.

And key figures in Fatah, controlled by Arafat, have declared that the intifadah will go on until Israel withdraws from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Hamas and Islamic Jihad, which oppose Israel's very existence, have vowed to continue the uprising.

The PA's record, however, is not entirely negative. It has lowered the level of violence, belatedly denounced the murder of civilians, promised to catch the perpetrators, partially resumed security co-operation and joint patrols with Israel, confiscated mortars and launchers, squelched several serious terrorist assaults against Israeli targets and stopped firing on the besieged Jerusalem suburb of Gilo.

Barely acknowledging these measures, senior Israeli officials have cast doubt on Palestinian intentions and actions. Israeli Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer has accused the Palestinians of "doing the minimum" to enforce the truce.

The Palestinians have adopted a similarly skeptical attitude toward Israel. They concede that Israel has eased the debilitating external and internal closure. But they are demanding a complete lifting of the closure, an immediate settlement freeze, a withdrawal of Israeli forces to pre-intifadah positions and a halt to the assassination of Palestinian militia leaders.

Israeli landscapes on display in Hamilton gallery

By MOURA WOLPERT
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Twenty-one paintings by Toronto-born artist Ron Gang are being exhibited for the first time in Canada, at the Westdale Gallery on August in Hamilton.

Titled The Colours of Israel, all but three of the 21 works are landscapes, acacia trees and cacti, painted in the northwestern Negev, where Gang has lived on Kibbutz Urim since 1972. The three exceptions are abstract mandalas inspired by Arab graffiti he saw in the Old City of Jerusalem.

Gang's paintings showcase his deep love of Israeli soil, a love, he explains, that stems from his early years on the kibbutz, when he worked on the land.

In Hamilton for the opening of his show on June 17, Gang was unassuming and soft spoken as he spoke about his art. A painting "can reach people on a level beyond which words cannot communicate," he said.

"Sometimes, I feel that I am an instrument through which the landscape paints itself."

Gang's studio is in a bomb shelter, but he paints "in the field," carrying his equipment the one and one half kilometres to his chosen site, where he remains as long as the sun is in the right position for the effect he wants to create. His landscapes are alive with movement; his colours vibrant yet subtle.

"Lush" is how gallery owner Linda MacRae, who discovered Gang on the Internet and immediately decided to bring him to Canada, describes them.

Although he always liked drawing, Gang had no intention of becoming an artist. His first teacher was his late father, Israel Gang, a Toronto high school teacher who gave up his dream of becoming an architect upon encountering discrimination at the University of Toronto.

"He taught me about perspective," Gang said.

Gang spent a year in Israel on a Habonim work project following high school graduation, and after obtaining a BA in philosophy and Middle Eastern studies at the University of Toronto, he turned to art for good.

Ron Gang's art is on display at the Westdale Gallery in Hamilton, Ont.

He began studying in Israel, first in part-time evening classes, then at the Tel Aviv School of Art (Kalisher). Since 1985, he has exhibited in numerous group and solo exhibitions in the country.

The show is at the Westdale Gallery, 23 Augusta St., Hamilton, to the end of July, but the paintings will remain here for a further six months. Gallery hours are Tuesday to Thursday, 11:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m., and by appointment. Call 905-523-5156, visit their Web site at www.westdalegallery.com or e-mail westdalegallery@hotmail.com.

Studio exhibits disabled students' art

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

When Ron Satok was studying art in New York in the late 1970s, he dreamt of becoming an "important artist." He wanted to return to Toronto in triumph and become a household name, like Michelangelo, his "supreme hero," or Monet.

Instead, Satok returned without his sight. Doctors had warned him for years that he would eventually go blind as a result of chronic glaucoma, and the disease caught up with him before he reached the age of 50.

"I thought God was punishing me by taking my sight," said Satok sitting comfortably in his studio/apartment surrounded by samples of the artwork he did when he could see.

"Life doesn't always work out the way you want it to," he said, remembering how he fought the disease's onslaught by refusing to change the style and difficulty of the artwork he produced. Despite protests from others, he completed a mural for a Massachusetts synagogue in shades of blue, which he says is the most difficult colour to work in when you're going blind because the eyes can no longer differentiate between various shades of the colour.

"Only a madman would have attempted it," he recalled.

"Most disabled persons go on a government pension, live in special housing, throw up their hands and become overwhelmed," said Satok.

"I wasn't going to accept [that life]. I said I was going to start my own art school. Everyone said I was crazy, but with all my experience and talent, I knew I had a lot inside me to share with others."

So in 1982 he founded the Satok School of the Arts where, for the past 19 years, he has taught children and adults who are blind or physically or mentally challenged, to discover their innermost emotions and transpose those emotions into some form of art.

This year's work will culminate in a July 25 open house where his students' art will be displayed at his studio.

TORONTO YIDDISH POET TRANSLATES POETRY OF MORDECAI GEBIRTIG

Toronto Yiddish poet Simcha Simchovitch, who celebrates his 80th birthday this month, has translated a collection of 88 lyrical poems by Mordecai Gebirtig, published recently as The Song That Never Died: The Poetry of Mordecai Gebirtig (Mosaic Press).

The book also carries Simchovitch's 15-page introduction on Gebirtig, one of the most popular and beloved Yiddish folk poets and song writers in prewar Poland. Gebirtig and his family were murdered by the Germans in the Krakow ghetto in June 1942, but his songs survived and have been translated into Hebrew, Polish, German, Italian and English.

The 154-page softcover book is available for $19 plus postage from Mosaic Press, 1252 Speers Rd., Units 1 & 2, Oakville, Ont., L6L 5N9, or from S. Simchovitch, 416-635-7199.

Art Imitates Life: Toronto playwright Jodi Miller has written a one-man play, Vladeck, about the vicious murder of a Toronto teen. The story resembles an actual case that sparked many headlines. The play's title character and another Jewish lad violently kick one of their peers to death for a pack of cigarettes and some loose change, then spend two weeks hiding from the police.

Vladeck won first prize in the Writeon! Writing competition. It is being read by Marcello Caberzas at Cameron House, 408 Queen St. W., Tuesday, July 17, 7 p.m. PWYC. 416-730-1104.

War Artists: Canadian war artists were courageous journalists who lived the lives of soldiers, with only pen and ink for protection. Many of their depictions of life in wartime during both the First and Second World Wars go on view at the Art Gallery of Ontario, Oct. 12, 2001 to Jan. 6, 2002.

The exhibition is titled Canvases of War: Masterpieces from the Canadian War Museum. Artists include A.Y. Jackson and Arthur Lismer in World War I, and Alex Colville, Molly Lamb Boback and Jack Shadbolt in World War II.

Chassidic Film: First Run Features has issued the 95-minute documentary film A Life Apart: Hasidism in America in DVD format, providing a new opportunity to view this riveting film by filmmakers Menachem Daum and Oren Rudavsky. The film, first released several years ago, was seven years in the making.

With their use of Yiddish, their distinctive garb and strict religious customs, the Chassidim of Greater New York are considered by many of their neighbours as an insular group with little connection to mainstream America. And yet their values are those that many Americans find most precious: family, community and a life of meaning.

Narrated by Leonard Nimoy and Sarah Jessica Parker, A Life Apart explores the closed world of the Chassidim, providing a warm, intimate and in-depth view of a culture that appears progressively less alien as the film advances.

The filmmakers offer several snippets of historic footage, such as the Lubavitcher Rebbe's 1929 visit to New York. He regarded America as a treife medina (unclean land) and so ignored his followers who implored him to leave Stalinist Russia. It took the Holocaust to get the Chassidim to come to America.

The DVD features an extended PBS interview with the directors and a directors' commentary track, which do not appear in the video format.

Rabbi Schild's memoirs of early years

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A crowd of about 600 people turned out recently for the book launch of The Very Narrow Bridge, a memoir by Rabbi Erwin Schild, the rabbi emeritus of the conservative Adath Israel congregation in the Wilson-Bathurst area.

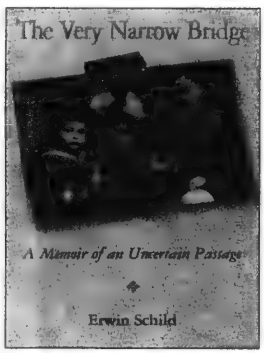
"This is unprecedented – I never saw anything like it," said veteran Toronto book publisher Malcolm Lester, referring to the huge line-ups of people waiting for Rabbi Schild to autograph their copies of the book.

According to both Lester and Adath Israel, who jointly published the hardcover volume, more than 300 copies were sold on the evening of the launch.

A German-born survivor of the Holocaust, Rabbi Schild joined Adath Israel in 1947 and served as its rabbi for 43 years, and then as rabbi emeritus to the present. Although his book recounts his first quarter-century of life in pre-war and wartime Germany, he says it is not a Holocaust memoir.

"I've written a book that is anything but sad," he said. "It's a cheerful book."

Still, he acknowledges that he felt a pressing duty to remember the many people he knew who perished.



"I have a great deal to be thankful for. My childhood friends were blotted out – entire families. There's no one left to know them. I wanted my book to be a monument to them."

Referring to those who died, Rabbi Schild said the book represents "some kind of tikkun [healing], some kind of repair or restoration for their lives that they were not allowed to live. I had to tell their stories interwoven with mine."

His impetus for writing, he said, was the curiosity shown by his children, grandchildren and other relatives, who asked many questions of a historic and genealogical nature.

"They asked me questions about how are we related to this one and how are we related to that one… I thought I would write it all down and produce something of 20 pages, but then the memories began rushing back to me," he told the assembled guests.

"Another reason I wrote the book is that I wanted you all to know me. I think if you really want to know me you've got to know where I came from… I think I became who I am in the first 27 years of my life, which are recalled in the 300 pages of the book.

"I wrote because my life was lived against the background of unprecedented events… What happened in Europe in the time of my youth were events that shaped the century and will perhaps shape the next century. It was such an extraordinary background that I could not help to write my story against [it]."

Sarah Edell Kelman, a well-known genealogist who recently moved from Boston to Toronto to become wife and rebbetzin of Rabbi Joseph Kelman, recalled that Rabbi Schild had been her esteemed "rabbi and mentor" even in the days when the two were studying together in the Oriental department of the University of Toronto.

She noted that the title of his book comes from an observation by the legendary Rabbi Nachman of Braslav that "the world is a very narrow bridge."

Malcolm Lester explained, however, that "when Rabbi Schild's manuscript came to us, it was called I Am, Therefore I Write. Being an admirer of Descartes, I liked the title but I felt it was inappropriate and didn't accurately address the book's content."

It was at Lester's urging, therefore, that Rabbi Schild came up with The Very Narrow Bridge.

"That title brilliantly captures the wonderful theme of the book," Lester said. "The very narrow bridge… can be viewed as the link between North America and Europe, and between the present and the past. The book is his bridge, his testament, to all his family, friends and colleagues who were murdered by the Nazis."

The book is expected to be available in bookstores in July.

Clearing the confusion over Entebbe raid movies

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

In a recent column, published by this paper a short time ago, Mark Mietkiewicz mentioned that the Internet movie database (www.imdb.com) lists four films about the Israeli rescue mission to Entebbe.

Though he is correct, the films, as listed in the column, do make for some confusion. I had to run to my computer and look up the database listings in order to sort them out in my own mind.

Three of the four films listed were produced just after the Entebbe raid. All three of those have been available on video for some time.

Victory At Entebbe was the first film about the subject. Made as a TV movie, it was rushed through production immediately after the news about the raid was announced. The quality of the film suffered as a result. Victory At Entebbe's very talented cast, which includes Kirk Douglas, Richard Dreyfuss, Anthony Hopkins, Burt Lancaster, Elizabeth Taylor, Linda Blair and Helen Hayes, doesn't hide a poorly written script. The producers don't seem to know what they want the film to say. The movie was released on video a few years ago by Warner Home Video.

The second film, Raid On Entebbe is significantly better. It was also produced for television, but it has a better, more intelligible script and the cast members – Peter Finch, Charles Bronson, Horst Buchholz, Martin Balsam, John Saxon, Jack Warden, Robert Loggia, James Woods and Yaphet Kotto – are more believable. And the action scenes are better staged than those in Victory At Entebbe.

The only real problem I had with Raid on Entebbe is that Bronson never did learn how to pronounce the name "Yoni" properly. But for action and accuracy, this is a good film made for television. It was released on video a number of years ago by HBO, and some stores may still have a copy.

Without a doubt, the best film produced about the Entebbe rescue is Operation Thunderbolt (also known as Mivtza Yonatan and Operation Jonathan).

Operation Thunderbolt was directed by Israeli filmmaker Menahem Golan and received the full co-operation of the Israel Defence Forces. Golan used several of the actual hostages as technical advisers and extras.

Operation Thunderbolt focuses on Yonatan Netanyahu and on the Israeli rescue team that brought the hostages home from Entebbe and gives us a more Israeli perspective on the entire affair. Yehoram Gaon,

The fact that each scene of this movie was filmed twice, once in English and once in Hebrew, may cause confusion. The English language version has been available on video for many years under the name Operation Thunderbolt and was released by MGM. The Hebrew version didn't become available on video in North America until a few years ago, when Sisu Home Entertainment, a small American video company, released it under the name Operation Jonathan.

In the opinion of most critics, Operation Thunderbolt is the best of the Entebbe films. But finding it in a video store may be a bit of a chore. Some older stores may have a copy of it, although I think it has been "on hiatus" for a number of years. MGM is currently in the process of re-releasing a large part of its catalogue and making its titles available on both VHS cassettes and on DVD. Hopefully, Operation Thunderbolt will be re-released as part of one of these packages.

The last entry in the movie database, Operation Thunderbolt: Entebbe (not to be confused with Operation Thunderbolt), is a documentary rather than a fictionalized account. The 52-minute documentary was produced recently in association with The Learning Channel. It is not available on video.

One final note. In 1986, Menahem Golan directed The Delta Force which used some of the facts from the Israeli rescue in a film about a group of hijacked airplane passengers that are rescued by an American commando team. In fact, the whole final scene in The Delta Force is almost an exact duplication of the final scene in Operation Thunderbolt. The Delta Force should be available in most video stores.

Angkor Wat temple truly an architectural wonder

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

SIEM REAP, Cambodia – This palm-fringed town in northern Cambodia, plopped in what seems like the middle of nowhere, would have no compelling reason for existing were it not for the magnificent ruins in the jungle beyond its muncipal boundaries.

A 45-minute flight from Cambodia's ramshackle capital, Phom Penh, Siem Reap's raison d'etre, first and last, boils down to its close proximity to the temples of Angkor, Cambodia's ancient capital.

Thanks to its inextricable assocciation with Angkor, Siem Reap is riding the crest of a hotel construction building boom.

The ruined temples, built at great cost by Khmer kings between the ninth and 13th centuries, are just a few kilometres from the centre of Siem Reap, and are easily accessible by car, bus or motor scooter.

Of some 250 temples, scattered over an area of 65 square miles, the grandest by far are Angkor Wat, Ta Prohm and Banyon. They are the crown jewels of this ensemble of magical buildings.

In the 15th century, when the Khmer Empire was already in a state of decline, Thai armies invaded Angkor and sacked it.

Fleeing Angkor, the Khmers left Angkor to the tender mercies of the encroaching jungle. Dense tropical vegetation engulfed the temples, and the giant roots of tropical hardwoods tore the buildings asunder, block by block.

In the 1860s, Henri Mouhot, a French naturalist, wrote a book about his travels. After the publication of Le Tour du Monde, the so-called "lost city" of Angkor became a focus of archeological research.

At the beginning of the 20th century, the French began to clear away the fecund vegetation that had enveloped Angkor. The restoration project, interrupted by war in the 1970s, is yet to be completed. Even today, technicians from a whole host of countries are hard at work renovating Angkor to a semblance of its former grandeur.

The restoration project was never universally popular. Some purists claimed that Angkor's mystery and allure could only be preserved by leaving it to the elements. To placate these vocal voices, one of the most important temples, Ta Prohm, was left to the ravages of nature.

Ta Prohm is an astounding sight to behold, looking a lot like it was the day French explorers stumbled upon it more than a century ago.

The largest temple after Angkor Wat, Ta Prohm is a picture of devastation, having all but been destroyed, bit by bit, by the sheer power and force of the forest.

Virtually hidden from view by dense vegetation, Ta Prohm has been relentlessly vanquished by a creeping tangle of trees, plants, shrubs and bushes.

Particularly awesome are the bulging roots of trees that have wrapped themselves around the walls of the temple. These gigantic roots resemble nothing less than menacing, overfed serpents.

Angkor Wat, with its three soaring towers and extraordinary bas reliefs, is Cambodia's national symbol. It is what travellers from near and afar most want to see when they converge on Angkor.

Approached by a laterite causeway traversing a moat once filled with crocodiles, Angkor Wat is really a shell of a building, but what a shell!

Facing westward, unlike the other temples, Angkor Wat inspires immediate and unconditional awe.

The bas reliefs of armies preparing for and fighting battles are so stupendous in scope and design that you can literally spend hours admiring the craftsmanship.

The steps to Angkor Wat's upper levels are extremely steep. You can only reach its ramparts by using both your hands and feet. It is neither for the faint of heart nor for the weak-kneed.

Being Cambodia's major tourist attraction, Angkor is blighted by hawkers insistently selling souvenirs, cold drinks, ice cream and mini tours.

Their presence, jarring though it may be, is a small price to pay for the privilege of being able to set foot in such a sublime place.

"I have one student, Debbie Donald, who is a quadrapolegic. Years ago she went diving with a friend. She was told the water was 10 feet deep, but when she jumped in she realized it was only two feet deep. She cracked her neck and lost her ability to move her arms and legs. [My school] taught her to paint and draw using her mouth."

To teach persons with disabilities, Satok created a philosophy he calls "art through awareness in action."

"What the school tries to do with people with special needs is find a voice for them. When we try to discover their primary voice we teach them to use their natural talents using what they have. The thing closest to their soul is their primary voice."

Satok, 69, also works with students who have no physical or mental disabilities.

One such student is 17-year-old Annie Vuong. She was so moved after meeting Donald that she is designing a sculpture inspired by Donald's story.

"I'm making a wire sculpture of a head because Debbie's soul is trapped in her head, but through her paintbrush she can be whole again," Vuong said.

She also drew the open house invitations' butterfly and flower logo using her mouth as a tribute to Donald.

Vuong says Satok has stimulated her artistic ability by teaching her how to release her emotions and express them in her art.

"I grew up in an Orthodox-Conservative home in Toronto," he explained. "I saw the look in my mother's face as she waved her hands over the Shabbat candles and covered her eyes and I was very moved."

By producing for synagogues and creating pictures of his Jewish background, Satok said that at the time he was able to retain a sense of who he was, though he says in all his art he tried not to be an elitist, and wanted his work to speak to the beholder.

He also produced murals that appear in the original Hockey Hall of Fame, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and the Medieval Times building as well as a mosaic for the Canadian Opera Centre.

Elder abuse said often ignored

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Leaders of faith communities are often unprepared, unable or even unwilling to help victims of elder abuse who turn to them for help, said Dr. Elizabeth Podnieks, an expert on the issue.

"Studies have shown that victims of abuse go to their faith leader for help. But what happens when they go there? What kind of assistance do they receive?" asked Podnieks, a professor at the Ryerson Polytechnic University school of nursing, a founding member of the Ontario Network for the Prevention of Elder Abuse and co-chair of the Provincial Elder Abuse Round Table.

Speaking at a recent general meeting of the Association of Jewish Seniors, Podnieks said the elderly victims, who may be living alone, in nursing homes or in other institutions, often do not get appropriate help from their faith leaders because not only do faith leaders not know how to deal with elder abuse, but many do not even know what the term means.

Elder abuse, which could be a steadily growing problem in the province, was defined by Podnieks as any act or behaviour that harms an elderly person, whether it be physical (pushing, shaking or over-medicating), psychological (treating elderly like children), financial (theft of money, withholding money or forcing a senior to sell property) or neglect (denial of adequate shelter, clothing, medical attention or adequate nutrition). Abusers may be spouses, children, hired homemakers, landlords or staff members of institutional settings.

The most prevalent reason faith leaders are reluctant to help, Podnieks said, was a lack of time. "The administrative work of faith leaders has increased... and there aren't enough faith leaders available to help. One clergyman told me he didn't have time to deal with one more social problem because he's already making room for so many. But at some point they've got to make time."

She said religious leaders are not trained in identifying elder abuse or counselling, and they don't know what services and resources are available to help the elderly.

In addition, "abuse is often covered up because faith leaders don't want to be pinpointed as having abuse in their communities – they want to keep it to themselves because it doesn't look good," she said.

Between four and 10 percent of Ontario's 1.45 million seniors have experienced or are experiencing abuse of some kind, she said. By 2021 when the senior population reaches almost three million, the problem of elder abuse could become more serious if steps are not taken to prevent it.

"The only hopeful part of elder abuse is prevention through education," said Podnieks.

"We have to start teaching children at a young age that growing old is good and that old people are good. Seniors won't be abused if people are taught at a young age to respect the elderly."

Yiddishist to mark 104th birthday

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — William "Velvl" Katz, the Yiddishist who will be 104 on Aug. 18, has confidence that "things will settle down" and that eventually Israel will triumph.

"Events will favour the Jewish nation," said Katz, his eyes sparkling under white hair, in a recent interview. Despite his age, Katz, who has a positive outlook on life, is mentally alert, lives independently in his own apartment in North York and attends the Friday morning sessions of the Yiddish Culture and Discussion Group at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living. Health permitting, he also attends Yiddish literature meetings at the Borochov and Winchevsky centres. (Katz recently recovered from a bout of pneumonia.)

'Velvl' Katz

On his 95th birthday, he took five ladies from the Betel Centre to lunch, said co-ordinator Bookie Kwart.

"It was really something to see this dapper man with a suit and tie and walking so straight; he is a gentleman's gentleman."

Kwart recalled that many years ago, she began to introduce in her Yiddish the late Julie Sokoloff, new leader of the Yiddish group, when Katz interrupted her politely and finished introducing Sokoloff in perfect Yiddish.

"He is very polite and deeply thoughtful," said Joseph Pinch, chair of the Betel group, which conducts its meetings in Yiddish and features readings of their favourite authors by its 50 members.

Katz attributes his long life to moderation in his personal habits, involving himself in stimulating activities and having a physically active routine. He loves dancing, and at one time went dancing two or three times a week with a group of friends. On his 97th birthday, he said, he gave it up to conserve his energy.

His own philosophy is to be good to people and not be envious of others.

Katz was born in Dzialochic, a chassidic community and shtetl in Poland, in 1897, though his birth certificate says 1898 because his parents were late in registering the birth. His mother died when he was young; his father ran a dry goods store. He attended a yeshiva in Poland but left the country to avoid the draft. He thereafter spent a year working in Germany, where he develped some of his socialist ideas.

Though he was taught the art of shoemaking in the shtetl, Katz could not find a job in his trade upon coming to Toronto alone in 1920 at the age of 23. His passage was paid for by his cousin's American uncle, and he had a mere $25 in his pocket, which was borrowed from a friend. Katz had been given the Toronto address of the Shidlovsky family, relatives of a friend.

He worked as an embroiderer in ladies' apparel, and helped found a local of the International Garment Workers, earning the nickname "lefty" for his socialist views. Later, in the 1950s, when Stalin's ruthless campaign against Jewish writers and poets surfaced, Katz went into the embroidery business with a partner. He retired in 1972.

While Katz's wife, Bluma Zhidlovsky died in 1972, Katz is still around to enjoy his five grandchildren and two great grandchildren.

Seniors & Health

Dear Dr. Veinish,

I've had about three falls in the last four months, and haven't really hurt myself except for minor bruising. My daughter is after to me to see the doctor – but what for? I'm okay!

Not Worried

Dear Not Worried,

Falls are a leading cause of accidents and injuries in older adults, and most falls are attributed to tripping or slipping, although not always correctly. Many factors contribute to the increased risk of falls as we age, including diseases, drugs and our environment. Visual changes, such as perceptual disturbances and increased sensitivity to glare due to cataracts, may make it more difficult to recognize a dangerous surface. Many illnesses, along with the medications used to treat them, such as sleeping pills, painkillers and antihistamines, may also make us slower and less able to respond.

Pain and disability often lead to inactivity. This in turn can lead to reduced strength, co-ordination and flexibility, all of which are important in helping to prevent falls and associated injuries.

You have fallen three times in the last four months, and on each occasion you were able to get up easily, with only minor bruising. This may indeed reflect the many physical strengths and advantages you have in your favour. But you should not ignore the fact that you have fallen repeatedly. Falls are a symptom – like a rash or fever. It is critical to determine the underlying reason for your falls and to learn how to prevent further injuries. Many public health agencies have developed programs which reinforce the recommendations I am including here.

There are many things you can do for yourself to reduce the risk. Footwear is always a good place to start. And just as properly fitted shoes with non-skid soles are important, so is a properly sized cane or walker. Your brother-in-law's just won't do!

Tack down or remove loose rugs and watch for long electrical cords. Bathrooms and stairwells are high-risk areas – use a bathmat, and install grab bars and handrails for additional support. Ensure that your pathway is clear of obstacles and well lit – both day and night.

Helping yourself should also include seeking advice from the experts – physiotherapists, occupational therapists, nurses and, of course, your doctor. These professionals can all help you ensure that you and your environment are as safe as possible.

It's in your hands – and feet! Take the necessary steps, and walk, don't run.

Dr. Shelley Veinish is a geriatrician at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and assistant professor in the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto.

Documentary takes behind the scenes look at boxing

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When you peel away the layers of BS about boxing's noble characteristics – the fighters' spirit, determination, fortitude and courage – you're still left with a "sport" whose prime purpose is for one participant to pummel another into unconsciousness, while (hopefully) stopping short of inflicting permanent brain damage or inducing a coma.

If you kill your opponent, an unfortunate though not altogether uncommon occurrence, it would only be seemly and in keeping with boxing's gentlemanly code that you express your regrets and offer to spring for the funeral, as happened recently after a fight on board a U.S. aircraft carrier.

So, who said boxing was a primitive pursuit – our reptilian brain at play – with few redeeming qualities? Why, it's as ennobling and incorruptible as, say, the porn industry.

Boxing and the porn industry, when you think about it, do share a few things in common. Both are industries that at one point existed at the fringes of polite society but which have insinuated themselves as mainstream entertainment; both are now massive, multi-million dollar enterprises; and both have a visceral, primitive appeal.

Filmmaker Ric Bienstock has noticed the similarities between the two businesses, in large part because two of her projects placed her smack dab in the middle of both. A few years ago, the Gemini-winning producer/director released The Money Shot, a documentary about the pornography industry. On Sunday, July 22, her latest work, Boxing: In and Out of the Ring, a behind the scenes expose of the boxing industry, will air on A&E. The 90-minute film will kick off a week of boxing biographies on the U.S. cable network.

Bienstock, whose credits include Ebola: Inside and Outbreak and Ms.Conception, a look at single mothers, had virtually no knowledge of boxing when she was asked by Associated Producers to handle the project. Now, with the film completed, she can rattle off acronyms of boxing licensing bodies, name promoters, fighters and TV pay-per-view networks like an old pro.

And why not. In making the documentary, she, co-producer Lynn Glazier and camera-woman Naomi Wise, were ushered into the hidden corridors of the boxing world where decisions were made that affected the careers of fighters and produced fat pay days for promoters.

The experience reminded her of that other sleazy world. "I kind of likened it to the pornography industry. When I did the film on porn, it was about how it functioned as a business and its entry into the mainstream," she said. "Both are visceral and somewhat shady."

Porn, she continued, has metamorphized into a "regular industry," while boxing still generates stories of corruption and scandal.

"It's an unregulated business. It's not run like any other sport... It's a bit like the Wild West," she said.

Which brings us to Don King, the uber-promoter with a finger in just about every boxing pie. King has a prominent place in the film, especially his recent efforts to lure South African heavyweight champion Hasim (Rock) Rahman away from his Jewish manager, Cedric Kushner. Although they didn't film King shlepping a duffel bag loaded with $200,000 to Rahman's New York City hotel room, the crew was in Kushner's office when he learned of the news.

Bienstock and her cohorts also found themselves smack in the middle of the Rahman/Lennox Lewis controversy over who Rahman would fight in his first title defence, as well as in the negotiations with HBO and Showtime over the next broadcast of the heavyweight championship.

Plenty of films have been made about pugilist heroes. Here's one that takes a candid look at the money, power and influence behind the fights.

Twelve-year-old earns spot in golf history

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

BOCA RATON, Fla. — Just one week prior to her 13th birthday, Morgan Pressel of Boca Raton became a household name in the golf world by becoming the youngest woman ever to qualify for a major women's golf championship. Pressel scored a two under par 70 at a sectional qualifier at the Bear Lakes Country Club in West Palm Beach to earn a spot at the U.S. Women's Open Golf Championship held recently in Southern Pines, N.C.

"It is a complete shock," said Pressel of the experience that brought her worldwide coverage. "I just wanted to try to compete for the experience; I never expected to win a spot in the U.S. Open."

Morgan Pressel

Pressel had a strong fan base watching her every stroke at the Open, as if she was a female Tiger Woods in the making. She attracted the attention of more than 100 spectators at every hole, many of them eight- and 10-year-old girls, who politely asked for her autograph.

Pressel obliged every autograph-seeker. She took up golf only four years ago and she too had sought autographs from top pros like Karrie Webb.

Pressel looks more like a typical teenager than a top golfer. She's five foot three, 110 pounds, with a blond ponytail, a bright smile and braces. She was a natural for the cameras that followed her every move at the tournament.

Unfortunately, Pressel didn't make the cut, shooting 77s in the first two rounds to finish tied for 120th, ahead of 19 pros and nine amateurs.

"What Morgan did was a lot better than anyone I know at her age. She was poised and looks like a young star in the making. She has an impressive short game and hits with power [230 yards from her driver], certainly not what I expected from such a young player," said Karrie Webb,who was so impressed with Pressel that she invited Pressel to practise with her at her hometown course in Florida.

Despite her impressive debut, Pressel's coach and grandfather, Dr. Herb Krickstein, a retired physician and pathologist, cautioned against comparisons between Pressel and a young Tiger Woods. "Morgan is learning but is not yet a great golfer. She is a great golfer for her age. There is a world of difference and she has a lot of time to improve her game. She has remarkable maturity on the course, and I hope that she continues to develop her game," Krickstein said.

For Krickstein, this is the second time he's grooming a young athlete into a star. He was pivotal in the success of his son, tennis star Aaron Krickstein (Morgan's uncle), moulding him to become a world top 10 player from 1983 to 1994. Aaron Krickstein holds the record for being the youngest player ever to win a men's pro title when he won a tournament in Tel Aviv in 1983. He also made tennis history by becoming one of three Jewish players (along with Jay Berger and Brad Gilbert) to win the Davis Cup for the United States in 1990.

"My father is very understanding and patient in helping young athletes," said Aaron. "There was never any pressure to win from him and he will be an asset to Morgan. I told her to relax and enjoy the experience."

Morgan's legacy includes many athletes in her family. Her mother, Kathy, was a Big Ten tennis champion at the University of Michigan. Her father, Mike, a real estate agent, played hockey in high school, and two other aunts were collegiate tennis stars.

Morgan is the eldest of three Pressel children, the others being her brother Mitchell, 7, and sister Madison, 9. Morgan learned golf while spending a lot of time with her grandfather in 1996. At that time, Kathy was undergoing chemotherapy in a successful battle against breast cancer and she sent her children to live temporarily with their grandparents. After Kathy's recovery, Morgan bonded closely with her grandfather upon her return to Boca Raton.

"I entrusted my dad with the development of Morgan's game," said Kathy Pressel. "She sees him almost every day after school, practising golf. She has fun with him. The most important thing is that she is brought up to be a normal child, not a star athlete."

When Morgan made history on May 15, the day she qualified for the Open, she celebrated with her grandfather – with an ice cream cone, followed a week later by an informal birthday party at her home. Armed with the knowledge of how a parent can add unwanted pressure to a talented athlete (as was the case in tennis with Jennifer Capriati and Mary Pierce), Herb Krickstein's easy-going nature allowed Aaron to excel in tennis. He hopes the same will happen with Morgan.

Morgan's family legacy also includes strong ties to Judaism and the mitzvah of giving back to help others in the community. Her great-grandfather was Rabbi Joseph Krickstein (Herb's father), a Conservative rabbi who had a pulpit in Ann Arbor, Mich. Although Herb was not interested in the rabbinate, excelling in baseball (he had a tryout with the Detroit Tigers but turned it down to be a pre-med student), he was instrumental in raising funds for the Jewish community. He sent Aaron to appear in a fund-raising tennis exhibition for the Miami Jewish Community Centres in 1984, and Aaron competed four times in tournaments held in Israel.

"Just as important in my life to doing well in golf was completing my bat mitzvah in front of all my family and friends," said Morgan, who celebrated her bat mitzvah last November at Congregation B'Nai Torah in Boca Raton.

Memories of Mordecai

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

This is as good a time as any to drop names. Nine years ago, I had drinks with Mordecai Richler, he keeping a perfectly level head after several whisky-and-Evians (no "plonk" for him), and me slack-jawed after some extra-light rum and Cokes (not being able to hold my liquor in his presence remains one of my great regrets).

Our interview at the Red Lion pub on Jarvis Street was at the height of l'affaire Richler, just after the appearance of Oh Canada! Oh Quebec! Requiem for a Divided Country. In excerpts which had run a few months earlier in the New Yorker, Richler blasted Quebec as a fundamentally anti-Semitic, xenophobic and tribal society, sentiments rooted in its intelligentsia, press and the Catholic Church.

Touchy Quebec nationalists, maligned before a large American audience, called for Richler's head on a platter. Some Bloc Québécois members wanted the book banned (admitting they hadn't read it, and wouldn't), while current BQ leader Gilles Duceppe tagged Richler as "a consummate racist with a totally decayed mind." For added measure, Duceppe called on the Jewish community to denounce the writer, failing which Jews could be perceived as Richler's "accomplices."

Now, you could have labelled Richler with any name you wanted. He'd heard it all, including the knee-jerk term fellow Jews had (and still reserve) for anyone who dares not to toe the party line: self-hating Jew. But it was the appeal to Canadian Jews to distance themselves from Richler that rankled and hurt him. More than that, it was the acquiescence to that demand in some quarters of the Jewish establishment that really got him steamed.

Richler had a great name himself for it: pusillanimous. Canadian Jewish Congress and some high-profile community members had delivered a mealy-mouthed response to Richler's book, saying the situation for Jews in Quebec wasn't nearly as bad as he had described, that his rhetoric was unfair and overheated, and that he had compounded his obloquy in a subsequent interview with Barbara Frum.

Richler, though peeved, responded to the brouhaha by recalling a joke: Two Jews, sentenced to death by the czar, are before the firing squad. They are offered blindfolds. One says, "You can stuff your blindfold." The second Jew responds, "Shh! Don't make trouble!" I laughed, though I'd heard it before.

That, to Richler, summed up what he called a shlepper's mentality in Jewish leadership; a paternalistic need to quiet waters, to lay low, to calm the shtetl down and show the czar that everyone was on their best behaviour. His being a Jew, he reasoned with typical irreverence, imposed no special obligation on Congress or anyone else to evaluate his every word. "It's possible," he told me between long drags on a cigarillo, "that the government of Albania or the SPCA or Black & Decker Tools don't agree with what I say, but they don't feel compelled to comment on it."

Richler preferred B'nai Brith's response, which noted that no U.S. congressman had ever called on the American Jewish public to denounce the writings of Philip Roth, Saul Bellow or Woody Allen.

Richler was not a spokesman for anything. And he didn't need a mouthpiece. He was a party of one, who, far from being a self-hating Jew, wrote lovingly of his heritage, warts and all. His beloved St. Urbain Street was never sugar-coated through the hazy mists of time; it was a chaotic, seething, cacophony peopled by pushy young Jews on the make, sons of exotic dancers, irascible cab drivers, crooks and rascals. In the realm of non-fiction, absurd language laws and anti-Semitic priests were all grist for his prickly mind. And if you or Canadian Jewish Congress didn't like it, well, nuts to you both.

I miss him already.

About Parenting

Rebecca Katz

It can be devastating for children to witness their parents' heated arguments, especially if they are angry about personal issues, say Lori Houzer, a child and adolescent therapist, and Rabbi Aryeh Pamensky, creator of the marriage seminar How to Make a Good Marriage Great.

Houzer explains that children can be psychologically affected by exposure to such intimate disputes, and the consequences may be observed through a child's anxiety, which can take the form of tics, stomachaches or headaches. The child may become withdrawn, or conversely, the child may act out at school, mocking the behaviour they witnessed at home.

"I don't think seeing a lot of rage is healthy. I think parents getting very angry at each other or at the kids... is scary," says Houzer.

Houzer recommends that if parents are losing control of their anger in front of a child, it is best for the angered parent to leave the room for a few minutes and return when he or she is feeling calm.

However, they should demonstrate to the child that there has been some sort of resolution. Otherwise they may be showing the child that it is acceptable to walk out on a problem without solving it.

While Houzer maintains that parents should be careful about how they argue and what they argue about in front of their children, she believes that sheltering a child from arguments can be damaging as well.

Rabbi Pamensky says it is important for parents to argue in front of their children, but only on pre-agreed upon topics.

"These topics have to be things that... you can resolve right then," such as a family member's diet, using the car or someone else's belongings without their consent.

The purpose of exposing children to good arguments, he explains, is that if children do not see parents argue, when they enter into marriages of their own and argue with their spouse they may think they have a bad marriage.

Rabbi Pamensky suggests that it is important for children to see arguing as part of the context of a very good marriage and that children should learn conflict resolution from their parents as well. The most effective way to learn that is to see it in action.

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

SCHWARTZ/REISMAN EMERGENCY CENTRE OFFICIALLY OPEN

Opening ceremonies for the new Schwartz/Reisman Emergency Centre were held at Mount Sinai Hospital on June 19th. The new state-of-the art centre was made possible solely through generous donations by Gerald Schwartz, President and CEO of Onex Corporation, his wife Heather Reisman, President and CEO of Indigo Books and Music Inc. and other donors.

"What a magnificent gift! It is already making a huge difference to patients, our staff and the community. For this reason we are truly grateful," said Joseph Mapa, President and CEO of Mount Sinai Hospital.

The newly renovated emergency centre is 25 per cent larger providing patients with quieter, less crowded surroundings, greater privacy and easier access to nursing stations, telephones and washrooms. In addition, the centre features a fast track treatment area that will reduce frustrating delays for patients who can be treated and released fairly quickly. This would include injuries such as minor broken bones, lacerations, sprains and strains and dental emergencies.

"We've all read or heard stories in the news about the long waiting times in Emergency Departments and ambulances having trouble accessing hospitals because of overcrowding," says Mr. Schwartz. "This gift ensures that Mount Sinai Hospital has a world-class Emergency Centre, known for its outstanding facilitates, technology, professional excellence and clinician care."

President of the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation Nicholas Offord described the gift as fundamental in meeting the needs of Mount Sinai Hospital's patient community. "It's wonderful to see the community step in to fill the gap. Generous funding from donors like Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman helps Mount Sinai Hospital provide patients with the latest technological advances in a humanistic setting."

RUBINOFF/GROSS CHAIR APPOINTMENT

Joseph Mapa, President and CEO of Mount Sinai Hospital is pleased to announce the appointment of Dr. Jay Wunder as the inaugural chair of the Rubinoff/Gross Chair in Orthopaedic Oncology.

"We are delighted with this development. The Rubinoff/Gross Chair in Orthopaedic Oncology combined with Dr. Wunder's extensive experience and reputation reinforce Mount Sinai Hospital's commitment to international excellence in orthopedic oncology," said Joseph Mapa President and CEO, Mount Sinai Hospital. "We are extremely grateful to our benefactors Bob Rubinoff and Dr. Allan Gross and other donors."

As Chair, Dr. Wunder will be responsible for the development and growth of research and educational initiatives relative to Orthopedic Oncology Programs, as part of the mission of the Department of Surgery, Division of Orthopedics, of the University of Toronto. Dr. Wunder will also provide leadership in orthopedic oncology, patient care, research and related educational activities within Mount Sinai Hospital.

ANOTHER YEAR OF GLITZ AND GLAMOUR AT AUXILIARY ANNUAL GALA

Rene Stein and Timmi Stein Macdonell

Patti LaBelle put on an exciting and electrifying performance at the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary 2001 Gala. As in years gone by, the Gala was a sold out event.

The premiere, black-tie event was held at the Metro Convention Centre, which was sophisticatedly decorated in a spring theme with the tables draped in lilac and adorned by bouquets of calla lilies.

"The Gala was an indescribable evening," said Rene Stein, Auxiliary Gala Chair "One that people will talk about for some time."

Sponsored by CIBC World Markets, Gala proceeds will support the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary's commitment to raise $6 million to develop the Centre for Mothers' and Infants' Health, to help high risk pregnancies and neo-natal care at Mount Sinai Hospital.

The evening included dinner, a live and silent auction, a raffle for a 2001 Pontiac Aztek GT, donated by General Motors of Canada, and a raffle for two passes to the 2002 Masters Golf Tournament.

GOLF TOURNAMENT RAISES RECORD FUNDS FOR LEADERSHIP SINAI CHAIR IN SURGERY

Equitable Trust - Title sponsor foursome

A sold-out field of 288 golfers made the seventh annual Mount Sinai Classic Golf Tournament the most successful ever. Participants came out to have fun and support a great cause. The tournament which took place on Monday, June 4, at RattleSnake Point Golf Club, netted almost twice as much as last year. Under the dedicated leadership of tournament Co-Chairs, Brian Cohen and Stephen Miller $190,000 was raised for The Leadership Sinai Chair in Surgery and the Leadership Sinai Advanced Surgical Technology Centre.

This year's event set records in every division, from sponsorship investment to auction revenue. Generous supporters included returning Title Sponsor Equitable Trust and Gold Sponsor Nike Canada, Supporting Sponsors MDC Corp. and Mintz & Partners, and Media Sponsor Lifestyles magazine.

Since its inception in 1995, the Mount Sinai Classic has raised more than $464,000 for various priority areas in the hospital, including Labour, Delivery and Recovery Room Project and the new Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes.

Although the air was chilly, the day was heated by great golf and exciting prizes.

Maccabiah gets colourful kick off

CJN Wire Services

JERUSALEM — The 16th Maccabiah kicked off to a bright and colourful start at Teddy Stadium amid unprecedented security as 14,000 spectators welcomed 3,200 athletes taking part in the week-long event. About a third of the athletes are Israelis.

Flying acrobats, floating nymphs, pre-teens in pink stripes simulating synchronized swimmers, dancing mascots and athletes paraded up and down the playing field, celebrating the opening of this year's Jewish Olympics.

And the onlookers loved it.

They cheered for every country, whether it was Ukraine, Uruguay or the United States. Clapping as each of the 45 countries was announced, they rose to their feet only when the blue-and-white Israeli contingent emerged at the end.

They munched on boureka pastries and cracked open bagfuls of sesame seeds, the Israeli version of hot dogs and popcorn. Many were immigrants from the countries represented in the Maccabiah, wearing their native countries' colours or waving their flags.

Swigging bottles of water and cola, they boogied to the Israeli music piped in through the loudspeakers. When the stadium lights went off, they swung the flashlights provided by El Al Israel Airlines, oohing and aahing at the fireworks that lit the sky.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Interfaith Mission

TORONTO — Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, has joined members of local Anglican and Catholic churches on a transcontinental convoy, driving eight school buses packed with emergency supplies to an earthquake-ravaged region of El Salvador. Dubbed "Operation Flor de Izote," after El Salvador's national flower, the mission departed last week for the seven-day trip, with 10 volunteers. After the delivery of the supplies, the buses will be donated to impoverished communities. An earthquake in January of this year destroyed over 150,000 homes in El Salvador.

Offers Help to OPP

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, has offered its assistance to the Ontario Provincial Police following recent allegations of pornography and racist joke trading by OPP employees. In a letter to OPP Commissioner Gwen Boniface, Frank Bialystok, chair of the CJC region's community relations committee, suggested that the bias and sensitivity training program, Understanding our Differences, developed by CJC might prove useful if it is determined that some remedial action is required to address the matter.

ISRAEL

Canadians on Mission

JERUSALEM — Some 45 Canadian Jewish leaders left July 15 on a five-day solidarity mission to Israel arranged by B'nai Brith Canada's Institute for International Affairs. Delegates planned to meet with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, former prime minster Benjamin Netanyahu and several government ministers to discuss security, political and humanitarian issues.

Slave Trade

JERUSALEM — Israel and 22 other countries do not meet the minimum standards for combating traffic in sex slaves and forced labourers, according to a U.S. State Department report. Ranked in the lowest grouping, Israel is a destination in trafficking from former Soviet states, Brazil, Turkey and South Africa, says the report. According to U.S. law, a country that does not comply with the minimum standards by 2003 will be subject to sanctions.

Bibi's Regrets

JERUSALEM — Former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu has called on the Knesset to rescind the Oslo peace accords. Interviewed on a right-wing radio station last week, Netanyahu also said he regrets signing a January 1997 agreement that transferred parts of Hebron to Palestinian control.

WORLD

Scottish Jews Worry

EDINBURGH — Leaders of Scotland's Jewish community are concerned after far-right graffiti appeared recently on a synagogue in northeast Scotland. Swastikas, skinhead symbols and anti-Semitic graffiti were painted on the only synagogue in Dundee early this month. A leader of Dundee's Jewish community described the incident as "clearly anti-Semitic," but also as "very minor." But anti-fascist campaigners say the incident is worrisome because there is a history of extremist activity in Dundee, a city of about 145,000.

Compensation Flap

BUDAPEST — The president of the Hungarian Jewish community is threatening to hold demonstrations if compensation payments to the relatives of Hungary's Holocaust victims are further delayed. Peter Tordai said his organization is appealing to Prime Minister Viktor Orban. Last December, a Hungarian court cancelled a 1999 compensation law that granted about $140 to Jews whose relatives were killed in the Holocaust, a fraction of the amount granted victims of communist terror, about $3,300 each.

Hitler Ads Pulled

TAIPEI — Taiwan's ruling party said it will halt television ads that include footage of Adolf Hitler. Following criticism from Jewish groups, the Democratic Progressive Party said it will stop airing the ads "out of respect for the Holocaust victims" and "to avoid further misinterpretations."

Jewish Unity For This Shabbat

JERUSALEM — The Jewish Unity Project was recently launched in Israel, with a view to getting as many Jews around the world to keep this Shabbat (July 28, the 8th of Av).

The project aims to unite Jews from all walks of life "to join together for the safety of Israel."

Organizers note that the period from July 8 to July 29 (Tisha b'Av) "has been a spiritually negative period throughout Jewish history as many catastrophes have occurred, especially on the ninth of Av. The first and second Temples were destroyed on that day, and the Spanish Inquisition and the Holocaust started during that period."

This Shabbat is called Shabbat Hazon, on which there is supposed to be a revelation of a time of peace and the third Temple to come.

The group is depending on word of mouth to advertise the initiative. Immigrants in Israel have gotten in touch with their home cities and towns and radio stations in Israel are announcing it for free. The Internet is also being used to spread the word.

York Region race relations dispute heats up

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The controversy swirling around York Region's race relations advisory committee continues, and threatens to scuttle whatever advances have been made in local Muslim-Jewish relations.

Bader Abu-Zahra, the embattled volunteer member of the race relations committee, has written to the region's school board requesting a meeting with its chair and director of education – but pointedly, not with Alan Shefman, head of the race relations committee and a Thornhill school trustee who has demanded Abu-Zahra's resignation.

Abu-Zahra, who has been at the centre of a heated controversy since April over allegations he distributed anti-Semitic material at a workshop on teaching the Holocaust, wants to meet with school board officials "to talk, to clarify the issue and to remove misunderstandings," Zafar Bangash, president of the Islamic Society of York Region, told The CJN.

(Bangash said he was speaking on behalf of Abu-Zahra, who has stopped commenting to media. "People are targeting him unnecessarily," Bangash said.)

Bangash bristled at suggestions that Abu-Zahra wants to meet with the school board to apologize or express regret for his actions. "It is the board that owes him an apology. He has been defamed."

Bangash said Abu-Zahra has requested a meeting, in writing, with Bill Crothers, chair of the York Region District School Board, and Bill Hogarth, the board's director of education. He did not know whether a meeting has been scheduled.

Bangash made a point of saying that Shefman would be unwelcome at any such meeting. "It is he who instigated all this," Bangash said angrily.

But as far as Canadian Jewish Congress knows, Shefman would be part of a meeting between board officials and Abu-Zahra. As of last week, that was Shefman's impression as well.

In any event, Shefman, a former director of education for the Ontario Human Rights Commission, still believes Abu-Zahra has no place on the race relations committee.

"Nothing has happened to change my mind," Shefman told The CJN. "My previous views still stand."

Those views have been bluntly stated. In an April 23 letter to Abu-Zahra, Shefman called the material Abu-Zahra handed out anti-Semitic "and therefore contrary to the ethos of the board of education and especially of this committee."

Shefman said that for a member of the race relations committee, which functions under the school board's auspices, to distribute "hateful and disrespectful" material is "totally unacceptable," and he asked for Abu-Zahra's "immediate resignation."

Abu-Zahra shot back by saying that "special focus" on the Holocaust is "exclusive and marginalizes the suffering of other people... the belief that there is a hierarchy of human suffering is in itself profoundly racist and deeply offensive."

He refused to quit, and in May, race relations committee members voted 12-9 that he should not be removed.

However, in June, the committee unanimously condemned the material he had distributed as anti-Semitic.

Also last month, Crothers, bowing to pressure from CJC, issued a statement dissociating the school board from the actions of Abu-Zahra, but without mentioning him by name.

The statement noted that at a board curriculum conference in April, "written material that was anti-Semitic in character was distributed to some participants by an individual attending the conference. I want to say very clearly and without reservation that this action was antithetical to the principles on which this board has been built."

The material in question consisted of a glowing review, contained in Impact International, an Islamic magazine based in London, of a notorious book by the American Jewish author Norman Finkelstein.

In The Holocaust Industry, Reflections on the Exploitation of Jewish Suffering, Finkelstein, the son of Holocaust survivors, argues the Holocaust is exploited by Jewish organizations to extort political power and financial gain, and as an ideological weapon to further Zionist objectives. The book also praises pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel's Web site.

> 'Things came to a head July 9'

But the main thrust of arguments put forward by Abu-Zahra and his supporters is that the York Region school board curriculum focuses too much on the Holocaust, to the exclusion of other genocides.

Things came to a head July 9, when a crowd of about 100 Muslims attempted to address a public school board meeting. Media reports described the scene as "chaos."

After being told by Crothers that they would have to wait until the end of the meeting to speak, angry audience members began to chant "Shame on you," forcing the board to take a 20-minute recess.

That move, and the fact the meeting started late, was seen by some, including Bangash, as a deliberate attempt to delay Muslims' evening prayers, something Shefman called "malicious and fallacious."

Neither does Shefman put much stock in the school board's ability to bring the affair to a satisfactory conclusion. "I don't think the board has the sensitivity," he said.

In the end, Bangash was permitted to address the board meeting. He called on the board to apologize to Abu-Zahra (who did not attend for fear of his safety) and criticized it for focusing too much on teaching the Holocaust.

Bangash told The CJN his group "has studied the curriculum very carefully," and has determined that precisely 28 percent of relevant material deals solely with the Holocaust. "The [school] board has not challenged our statement," he added.

"We are all concerned about the curriculum being inclusive. We want simply to hold the board to its own stated policy. We are not asking for anything new."

Recently, Toronto Star columnist Michele Landsberg weighed in on the controversy, noting that within the board's curriculum, the Holocaust theme is optional, and offers a window into several units on human rights, race hatred and other genocides, including those in Armenia and Rwanda, depending on the makeup of a class.

Bangash scoffed at that.

"Are you telling me that if there are enough Palestinian children in class, they would hear about the Palestinian genocide? Can you prove it?"

He also rejected suggestions by CJC and Shefman that Middle East politics are fueling the controversy.

Ed Morgan, chair of CJC's Ontario region, said Congress isn't expecting an apology from Abu-Zahra, "just an expression of understanding."

Ross Virgo, a spokesperson for the York Region District School Board, told The CJN that as of last Thursday, no request by Abu-Zahra for a meeting had been received.

Peace is Possible, by Benjamin Nurgitz, Gr. 11, CHAT

A world around us roiling with fear
We must not bring chaos here
The people fall down
Such evil near, in blood we drown
Pain in their hearts
Here we stand to the return of death-carts
Children cry to end the war
Fields of scorched crops
Aggressive actions new peace shall bar
And no more bombs shall blow our tops

Brotherhood will heal hatred of creed
Friendship will cure the world of its borders
For peace to take hold, unity comes first
For this world there is increased need
To relinquish ethnocentrism are the new orders
To bring the Possible Peace in a burst

Peace is possible only with co-operation
Every nation can practice its customs
Advancing towards a collective purpose
Compassion for all beings, to all beings
Every being can work together for common good

Is humanity as fragile as the thinnest ice?
Survival not the common goal of everyone?
Peace is possible if we persist
Only we stop ourselves from our goal
Silver and gold need not be start or end
Saccharine partnership is not far from our grasp
If we but try, if we but think to act to live
Barriers should melt away in the new dawn
Labour in vain peacemakers should not Eager to acquire what we should have had

Remember our past mired in hate and loss
Or more mistakes and follies shall we make
Or more losses shall tear us apart
We are what makes the world

The Note in the Kotel, by Adam Zrehen, Gr. 4, Or Haemet

"One night I had a dream that I was walking towards the Kotel when I saw a note. I was going to put it back in its place but something told me to read it. So I read it. It said: If you care about someone there will be peace. I woke up and thought of that strange dream. I didn't understand what it meant.

"I went to breakfast and I saw my sister trying to get the cereal. She broke her leg so I decided to get it for her. I was thinking about the note and how it said if you care about someone it will bring peace but there was no peace.

"I was on the bus and an old lady came on. I gave her my seat and I was thinking what could it have meant? I went off the bus and I saw a blind man trying to cross the street. I asked him if he needed help and he said: "Yes." I took him to his house and he said: "Thanks." Then I thought of my dream.

"When I was going to bed that day, I thought of that dream. Then, I got it: it meant if you help and care about people, it would bring peace because when you bring peace from fear and worry, you bring peace of mind."

Peace Starts with Little Things, by Sheri Margolian, Gr. 6, Associated

Peace starts with little things
And not just with presidents and kings.
It's up to everyone, including you and I
To stop the wars, so no one else has to die.

Peace starts with us being kind to each other,
To every stranger, friend, sister and brother.
Just treat people you meet with respect
And you'll see what actions you can effect.

With so many countries and cultures around
And so many different religions to be found
We must try to understand and accept people's differences
So we all can lead peaceful coexistences.

Side by side, and day by day,
It's all the small things that will lead the way,
To stop all the arguing and all the fights,
And turn our energy to hit new heights.

Peace can start with a few little things
That will grow and take hold and spread their wings.
With the kindness, respect and understanding we show
We can plant the seed of peace and watch it grow.

Together, you and I can help bring peace and end war,
And see all the hurt people's spirits soar,
Because peace starts with little things,
And not just with presidents and kings.

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — No new Nazi war crimes prosecutions were initiated in 2000-2001, though the number of war crimes cases shot up in the past year, according to the annual report of Canada's War Crimes Program.

The passage of time since the end of World War II "has made it increasingly difficult to obtain admissible evidence to enable the [Justice Department's War Crimes] Section to bring forward... proceedings," the report states. "Notwithstanding these difficulties, the Section is still actively investigating World War II matters."

In the last year, 42 alleged war criminals were removed from Canada, 53 persons were excluded from the refugee determination process and 644 persons were refused entry into Canada.

The War Crimes Section currently has 85 active World War II files and initial checks are being undertaken in 147 other cases, according to the report, available at www.cici.gc.ca/english/pub/ war2001.html. Despite the number of active files, since 1995, only 17 citizenship revocation and deportation proceedings have been launched by Citizenship and Immigration Canada, based on the recommendations of the War Crimes Section.

Three years ago, it appeared Canada was ready to pick up the pace of prosecutions. At the time, the War Crimes Section promised to launch 14 new cases by 2001. Since then, only a handful of new cases have been brought forward.

The War Crimes Section remains fully staffed and committed to bringing forward new cases, said Terry Beitner, director of the unit. In recent months, its investigators have interviewed numerous witnesses and travelled to Eastern Europe, Italy, the United States and Germany to pursue leads.

"You can expect some new cases to be launched shortly," Beitner said.

Beitner said the Section's efforts were stymied, in part by delays resulting from an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada in a case involving three suspects (who alleged judicial interference).

At the same time, seven war crimes cases were either before the courts or administrative tribunals. The Section put a lot of effort into those files, limiting its ability to initiate new cases. Over the past 12 months, the Section has been focusing on case development, with the resulting expectation of new proceedings on the horizon, Beitner said.

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesman Irving Abella called the report both encouraging and disappointing. The government seems to be making a concerted effort to investigate more suspects, but "there's a disconnect between the ability to go after them and to get them out of the country," he said.

Abella, a professor of history at York University, pointed out that as of 10 years ago, Canada had deported only one Nazi war criminal since the end of the war. "That's still the case," he said.

"Even those found to have entered the country illegally are still here," he added, pointing to the case of Helmut Oberlander, the Kitchener real estate developer who, as a youth, served as a translator in a Nazi killing unit.

His case has been stalled at the cabinet level for months, Abella said, even though a Federal Court judge found 1½ years ago that Oberlander gained admission to Canada by fraud.

Meanwhile, Michael Seifert of Vancouver has been found guilty of murder in absentia by an Italian court, and "there is no effort as far as we know to get rid of him," Abella said.

In its tally of the 17 Nazi war crimes cases launched in Canada, the report found that five were successful (two of the war criminals died before they could be deported, the others are contesting their denaturalization), two suspects left the country without contesting the proceedings, three suspects were successful in Federal Court, six suspects died at some point in the proceedings, two cases (Jacob Fast and Walter Obodzinsky) are still before the courts and the Section is awaiting a decision in the Michael Baumgartner case.

In the Fast case, the defence has filed for a "litigation guardian," arguing their client is not competent to understand the proceedings. The Justice Department has asked the court to order a medical examination of Fast.

The defence in the Obodzinsky case is seeking a stay of proceedings on the basis of ill health. Although the Federal Court of Appeal has turned down their request, the defence has until the end of August to seek leave of the Supreme Court to hear the case.

Jews for Judaism faces tough fight, formidable opponents

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — About a dozen leaders of Jews for Judaism (J4J) gathered recently to discuss international developments in the Jewish resistance to Christian missionizing efforts.

In a modest meeting room in the Lipa Green Building, they exchanged information and updated each other on effective tools that might "inoculate" Jews in North America and South Africa from the immense, well-funded Christian missionary movement that has targeted Jews for conversion around the world.

By all accounts, they face a tough, uphill fight from formidable opponents who are pulling out all the stops in an effort to convince Jews to accept Jesus as the messiah. There are 60 to 70 million evangelical Christians in the United States, and according to Mark Powers, the Baltimore-based international director of J4J, these Christians are placing the effort to convert Jews at the forefront of their agenda. Southern Baptists, for one, announced several years ago that it was "open season on Jews," and told their congregations to "go get 'em," he said.

Rabbi Skobac

More than 900 groups in the United States are targeting Jews. Jews for Jesus alone has a budget of more than $12 million US while Chosen People Ministries spends more than $5 million per year. All branches of Jews for Judaism in North America and South Africa spend a total of $1 million US per year, said Rabbi Michael Skobac, education director of J4J's Toronto office.

Viewing the thin rabbinic line that is defending the gates of Judaism from those who would assail it is like watching the mythical little Dutch boy frantically placing his finger in a dike, trying to stem the flow of water onto dry land.

It appears the odds are against them, but Powers has an answer for those who despair at the scope of the task. It comes in the form of a parable that tells the story of a young boy walking on a beach at low tide. To his consternation, he finds the beach full of starfish, grounded by the receding waters. The boy begins to throw them back, one at a time. An old man on the beach sees what he's doing and asks him, "Why are you bothering? How can you possibly have an impact on all those starfish?"

Throwing one into the sea, the boy turns to him and says, "I made an impact on that one."

Despite the disparity in resources, J4J can boast of some successes, like the case of the woman who had grown up in an Orthodox home and had been touted as a prize catch by Christian missionaries. She returned to the Jewish fold after being invited to spend a Shabbat dinner with J4J and after long hours of discussions on the theological differences in the religions, Powers said.

Powers and Rabbi Skobac don't point to specific figures when discussing their success rate. Powers likes to quote the talmudic dictum that states, if you save a Jewish life, it is like saving a world. Rabbi Skobac said "hundreds of people around the world have come back to Judaism" thanks to J4J's efforts.

Right now there are plenty of Jewish lives to be saved from the missionary movement. In South Africa, said Rabbi Graeme Finkelstein, as many as 3,000 Jews out of the country's total Jewish population of 80,000 are involved in some sort of Hebrew Christian group.

In North America, Jews for Jesus has targeted Jewish communities of 25,000 or more. "We see a tremendous effort to proselytize the Jews," Powers said.

Jews for Judaism has devised a number of strategies to counter those efforts, and in Toronto, they exchanged information as to their efficacy.

In Los Angeles, the office has introduced a new program for interfaith couples, called Two Roads, One Path (www.tworoadsonepath.com). It suggests answers to questions posed by couples trying to accommodate their divergent traditions.

C.P.R. for the Jewish Soul, a community prevention and response program, was touted by the Baltimore office of J4J while the Toronto office has developed an approach to dealing with Jews who have joined various cults.

The meetings, in addition to facilitating the sharing of information, aid in professional development, the adoption of new technology and the exchange of information leading to a broadening of the organization's mandate, Rabbi Skobac said. The Internet has proven useful in facilitating communication between J4J's branches and in bringing its message to the wider community (www.jewsforjudaism.org), he added.

Besides working to bring Jews back to Judaism, the organization attempts to educate the community about the threat to its future well-being and promote Judaism as a spiritually uplifting antidote to missionaries and cults, Rabbi Skobac said.

From their exchanges with Jews who have been recruited to Christianity, J4J representatives have noticed that few "take the trouble to investigate the Jewish side of the story," Rabbi Skobac said. "If a Jewish person is willing to study, to learn, then 70 percent will come back to Judaism."

The Toronto branch of J4J, which receives about 10 percent of its funding from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, is supported primarily by private donations. It operates on a budget of about $400,000 per year.

Rabbi Skobac said plans are being advanced to expand the organization's presence in Montreal – likely with the help of volunteers – and perhaps to other Canadian centres in the future.

Intermarriage on the agenda at men's club convention

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi David Booth believes that we are living through the second greatest crisis in Jewish history.

A simple, informal poll during his keynote address at the recent biennial convention of the Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs underscored his point.

Only a handful of the 300 men representing the brotherhood organizations of their Conservative synagogues in Canada and the United States indicated that they could read and understand Hebrew, yet the vast majority of listeners raised their hands when Rabbi Booth asked how many had a non-Jewish relative, out to the level of second cousin.

Although their answers may or may not be indicative of a crisis on the scale of the destruction of the Second Temple, Rabbi Booth stressed that much of Jewish life today is based on assumptions that are no longer true – a situation he compared to the time following the Temple's destruction, which precipitated a radical transformation from biblical to rabbinic Judaism.

Make Judaism 'more relevant'

The 31-year-old rabbi, a native of San Francisco who is leaving a Virginia pulpit to serve a congregation in Ocean, New Jersey, said, "We can transform our Judaism [while maintaining] our commitment to Halachah and holiness, but the emphasis may have to undergo some serious and major changes."

Among his suggestions to make Judaism more relevant were:

• putting mikvah (ritual immersion following a woman's menstruation) in the context of marital issues such as sexual boredom and treating a spouse as an object;

• talking about Shabbat as an "escape from multi-tasking" and an opportunity to focus on God, community and family;

• making a place for non-Jews in the community, and thinking about encouraging conversion.

At his own synagogue last year, on the second day of Rosh Hashanah (following a distinct lack of interest the previous day), he invited congregants to share an experience of having been overwhelmed by God's power. The result, he said, was an inspiring service that was also halachic.

To create synagogue programming that speaks to people's actual interests, Rabbi Booth said that "a social component is critical, but we shouldn't stop with basement-level Judaism. The other component has to be real Torah learning that talks about issues people are carrying with them."

Among such issues, intermarriage was a key topic at the four-day convention, where the FJMC launched their recently published 70-page softcover book, Building the Faith, A Book of Inclusion for Dual-Faith Families.

In light of that theme, Rabbi Booth led a convention workshop entitled Grandparenting in the Age of Intermarriage.

The rabbi, whose in-laws are not Jewish, shared some of his own experience as a father of three young children and also as a brother whose sister has a non-Jewish boyfriend.

"We both got more serious about Judaism," he said, referring to his wife, who converted three years after they started dating, and to his own non-observant background.

While the rabbi wants his in-laws to be involved in his children's lives in an integral way, he said, "when we visit it's very clear that we visit relatives who have a different religious practice, with which we don't agree ...We can be accepting and loving of people who are different from us. We want to make our family understand that we love them and we want them to feel part of our children's lives."

Workshop participants had many questions about family members who are interdating or intermarried. Rabbi Booth advised them to be "very welcoming" but not to be afraid of raising issues like the importance of Judaism to the parent or the child, or even the possibility of conversion. His wife, he said, never knew it was possible to convert to Judaism until she sought out a rabbi to discuss her interest in the religion.

The rabbi agreed with parents who said their children would not welcome interference, and added that they would be turned off by anything they perceived as racist. The type of language used is critical, he said.

He advised parents to avoid being judgmental and to provide "warm, loving memories of being in a Jewish household."

Invite the children for Pesach, but do it because you love them, not because you want them to be Jewish, he counselled. "It's very important you're not trying to twist anyone's arm, not even hoping they convert. The warmth and the welcoming is critical."

Rabbi Booth believes the Conservative movement is making a "huge mistake" by not allowing intermarried Jews to hold office in the synagogue. The same rules don't apply to members who are not Shomer Shabbat, he pointed out.

Men's clubs can play a role by offering groups for people whose children are intermarried or considering intermarriage, and by inviting non-Jewish men married to Jewish women to programs that might interest them.

"I don't mean to imply that intermarriage is okay," he specified. "We are against intermarriage, but we are in favour of marriage. Now that there's an intermarriage, we want to bring resources to help."

Tears of sorrow, tears of joy

As sundown brings the Sabbath to an end this weekend, the page of the calendar will fall onto Tisha b'Av, the ninth day of the month of Av, a low, melancholy day in Jewish history and tradition. Both the first and second Temples were destroyed on this date in 586 BCE and 70 CE, respectively. Betar, the last stronghold of the Bar Kochba revolt in 135 CE, fell on the ninth of Av. One year later, in 136 CE, the Roman emperor Hadrian chose this very same day to erect a pagan temple on the site of the destroyed Jewish temple. Some 1,300 years later, historians also record, the expulsion of the esteemed Jewish community from Spain took effect.

The Encyclopedia Judaica describes the ninth of Av as "a symbol for all the persecutions and misfortunes of the Jewish people, for the loss of national independence and the sufferings in exile. The massacres of whole communities during the Crusades intensified this association."

The day is marked by various rituals of mourning and customs of consolation throughout the Jewish world. The feelings of calamity and utter loss that it engenders are encapsulated in Psalm 137: "By the rivers of Babylon, we sat down and wept when we remembered Zion." Of all the 150 psalms in the canon, Psalm 137 is perhaps one of the most widely known because it both promises and importunes the Jewish people never to forget Jerusalem. That promise, that importuning, for nearly two millennia, has been one of the most deeply defining brushstrokes on the rich, colourful, diverse tableau of Jewish peoplehood.

But there are forces among Israel's enemies who would deny the origin and historicity of that promise and who would relegate Jewish peoplehood to nothing more than an accident of European migration and demographics. The political leaders of the Palestine Authority and the Wakf, the Palestinian trust of religious leaders that administers the Temple Mount, publicly disclaim any Jewish historical or religious attachment to the Western Wall.

Thus, this Tisha b'Av, even as we "weep" by the rivers of our disparate Diaspora "Babylons," let us keep keenly in mind the promise that for thousands of years has defined who we are and who we must always be. And as we recall that promise, let us also recall its ongoing fulfilment to which the people of Israel and the Jewish people, are totally dedicated. Alas, it is a fulfilment we recall infrequently, if at all, ever since Yasser Arafat launched his "low-grade" war against Israel last year.

The emotions and feelings engendered by that fulfilment are encapsulated in another widely known psalm, Psalm 126: "When God restores Zion, we will be as dreamers; we will be full of celebration and joy."

Tears of sorrow, tears of joy: they are the antipodes of Jewish existence, our burden and our glory, our reason to mourn, our reason to fulfill that promise.

Door-knocking over by 1952

I read your article about Eva and Harold Dessen (CJN, July 5) with great interest and enjoyed it very much. However, I would like to point out what may have been a typographical error, or if not, what I consider to be incorrect information.

The article stated that Harold Dessen "first became a board member in 1952, when the school was basically an evening school." I take exception to the date in that statement, since at that time I was in Grade 6 in the day school – The Toronto Hebrew Day School, as it was called then – and by that time, two classes had already graduated from Grade 8 and those students were in the public high school system. In 1952, there were at least 16 classes ranging from kindergarten to Grade 8, and except for the Grade 7 and 8 classes of that year, all grades had at least two parallel classes. The student body had to number well over 250 children, maybe even much higher than that.

In addition to my being one of the students in the day school, my mother, Jennie Snider, was the principal of the general studies program, a position she had held since the first Grade 1 class had started in the school, which was in 1943 (after having been hired the previous year to teach the first kindergarten class).

Thus I am quite sure that by 1952, Dr. Jacober was no longer knocking on doors trying to recruit students for the school. The school was well known in the Jewish community by then, and its academic record, certainly in the general studies department, was starting to be recognized and accepted for its high level of achievement as the older students entered the public high schools.

We at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre/ Koffler Centre of the Arts thank you for your coverage of the 13th Annual Canadian Jewish Book Awards (CJN, June 21), which was recently held at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

As the article pointed out, this year's awards were a record-breaker in terms of attendance, but it failed to mention that the awards were made possible by the multi-faceted, growing cultural programming of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre/Koffler Centre of the Arts. I felt compelled to point this out for the Jewish community's future reference.

Letter writer missed details

In his guest voice (CJN, July 12), Wayne Levin expresses his displeasure with the UJA/CJC full-page backgrounders on school funding that have appeared in this newspaper.

Contrary to Levin's perspective, these information pieces are indeed part of our effort to both educate and mobilize our community regarding tax credits. In fact, the information contained the key points that Levin considered so important to publicize, including myths and facts, as well as a call to action by the Jewish community.

We, along with UJA Federation, the Ontario Alliance of Jewish Day Schools and our other partners with whom we have been working tirelessly, will continue negotiating with the provincial government to ensure that upcoming regulations make this credit work for our parents and schools. At the same time, we will persist in aggressively countering the distorted arguments put forward by opponents to such public funding.

CJC works in a spirit of community volunteerism and therefore is only as strong as its volunteers. We invite Levin, as we have in the past, to come and participate in this or any other CJC matters of interest.

CJN posed wrong question

Regarding the Perspectives (CJN, July 12), "Should Clinton have spoken on behalf of Yad Vashem?", the two articles have opposing views to keep the "balance," I suppose. But is there a balance?

I agree with Juliet Karugahe's views and words. Henry Odimbe Ojambo, on the other hand, sounds very much of an apologist for the well-known "bystanders" in 1994 – the sort of individuals Jews have been condemning and criticizing for at least 50 years now, in connection with the Nazi genocide from 1939 to 1945.

What bothers me most is the caption before the articles, especially the last sentence: "What should have been the proper Western response to the slaughter?"

Why such a useless question by us Jews who ought to know better? How many times did we say – not ask – what should have been the proper response of any political power to the slaughter of the Jews in Europe and North Africa?

Instead, the question should have been: What should have been the proper action on the part of Western powers and the UN to prevent the slaughter? Did "never again" became nothing more than an empty slogan?

How soon we forget!

Delegitimization of Jews back on UN agenda

By DAVID H. GOLDBERG

Yet another crisis is brewing in Israel's relationship with the United Nations, a crisis which could also have implications for Canada.

The World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance is scheduled to take place from August 31 to September 7 in Durban, South Africa. Every indication suggests that this meeting, to be convened under the auspices of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights (UNCHR), will exceed all previous efforts by international institutions to isolate and delegitimize Israel, including the infamous "Zionism is racism" resolution (UN General Assembly 3379) of November 1975. (The two previous world conferences against racism, in 1978 and 1983, both stumbled over overt attempts by the Third World bloc of countries to use these gatherings as venues for impugning Israel and Zionism.)

At this latest conference's Asian preparatory meeting, held last February in Tehran, Iran, a series of anti-Zionist – indeed, blatantly anti-Semitic – draft resolutions were adopted. Many of these, which still are being considered for inclusion in the final resolution package of the Durban meetings, are overtly racist and make a mockery of the conference's noble goals. They revive the "Zionism is racism" canard by condemning Israeli policies and practices toward the Palestinians as "racist," a "crime against humanity" and tantamount to the "ethnic cleansing of the Arab population in historic Palestine."

The draft resolutions also seek to dehumanize the Jewish people in general, by deleting anti-Semitism as a recognized form of racism and by diminishing the significance of Jewish suffering resulting from anti-Semitism (for instance, by changing the condemnation of "the Holocaust" to the condemnation of multiple "holocausts" and other forms of genocide, including, predictably, the alleged "genocide" perpetrated against the Palestinian people by Israel).

As reported in The Jerusalem Post on July 6, Deputy Foreign Minister Michael Melchior, Israel's point-man on the conference, views the draft resolutions as "some of the worst expressions of delegitimization of Jews that we have ever experienced." It is, in Melchior's mind, appropriate to offer fair criticism of specific Israeli policies and practices. But it is something entirely different to turn Israel and Zionism – and by extension, Judaism – into an "absolute evil." Melchior says it is "absurd" that Israel is the only country singled out for "poisonous" criticism at the conference, and charges that this anomaly is "motivated by very special hatred" toward the Jewish State and the Jewish people in general, a hatred that is driven by what he calls a "new wave of anti-Semitism."

International human rights lawyer and Canadian parliamentarian Irwin Cotler takes Melchior's analysis a step further. He asserts that the promotion of human rights has become a virtual religion in contemporary politics, and that for much of the world's human rights community, Israel – and the very concept of sovereign Jewish nationalism anywhere in the Middle East – is nothing less than the "anti-Christ."

The anticipated assault on Israel at this summer's gathering cannot be separated from the campaign of violence and propaganda initiated by Yasser Arafat last September. One of Arafat's key strategies in this campaign is to squeeze maximum territorial concessions from Israel – beyond even the generous ones offered by Ehud Barak at the Camp David and Taba talks – by discrediting the Jewish State in the eyes of the international community and thereby using the international community as another way to extract additional concessions.

Michael Melchior

This strategy has an obvious military component, as seen by Arafat's use of children in confrontations with Israeli soldiers and his deliberate provoking of the IDF into ever more forceful retaliatory strikes. Both of these only serve to perpetuate the Palestinians' carefully cultivated image of "victimization" at the hands of the "much more powerful" Israelis.

However, there is also a distinctly political dimension to Arafat's strategy. Arafat intends to undermine Israel's international standing by defaming the entire Zionist endeavour, including its contemporary leaders – hence, the emergence of the campaign to indict Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for his activities in the 1982 war in Lebanon.

As reported in The CJN on July 12, Canadian Jewish leaders are participating in an international coalition of Jewish, non-governmental organizations working closely with Israel to monitor proceedings leading up to the conference. Their goal is to generate sufficient international pressure to have the offensive anti-Zionist and anti-Semitic resolutions withdrawn from the agenda. Though they are justifiably skeptical about achieving this, the coalition members are nevertheless determined to have a presence in Durban and to make Israel's case in the NGO meetings prior to the start of the formal governmental deliberations.

For its part, Israel is said to still be considering its options, with some officials supporting a boycott of the conference if the controversial resolutions remain on the agenda. Other Israeli officials, while no less troubled, argue that to undertake a boycott is to concede defeat to Arafat.

An important variable in the Israeli calculus is the attitude toward the conference adopted by the United States. The Bush administration, on more than one occasion, has threatened to boycott the meetings if the Arab and developing world blocs continue in their efforts to transform the proceedings into an "Israel bashing" exercise. (Indeed, the United States did not participate in the earlier two world conferences against racism in large measure because of the unfair treatment of Israel.)

Yet the Americans have other, significant problems with the conference. Earlier this year, the United States was summarily voted out of the UNCHR. Moreover, the Bush administration has objected to the developing countries' determination to force onto the agenda resolutions demanding that Western countries formally apologize and offer financial restitution for the enslavement of Africans centuries ago. There is growing pressure in Congress to boycott the conference on these grounds alone.

A decision by Washington to boycott the conference might make it easier for Israel to do the same, but, as noted above, there are other factors to be considered by Jerusalem in this regard.

In any event, the threat of an American boycott, while no doubt significant, will not necessarily cause the Afro-Asian majority driving the conference agenda to desist in their diplomatic assault on Israel. Realpolitik indicates that only a threat by the entire bloc of Western industrialized countries, led by the European Union, to join in a boycott, might have the desired effect. Yet there is no evidence that such an EU threat is forthcoming.

What, then, can we reasonably expect from Canada?

To begin, Canada should continue to work with other well-meaning parties to temper the more offensive elements of the draft resolutions affecting Israel and Zionism. Israeli sources express sincere appreciation for the efforts Canadian officials are making in ongoing preparatory committee meetings in Geneva to encourage resolutions that, while perhaps critical of specific Israeli policies and practices, will not cast aspersions on Zionism and the Jewish religion in general. At a minimum, Canada should continue these efforts, up to the conference's start.

Ideally, Canada should be prepared to join the United States and its other principal Western allies in threatening a boycott if steps are not taken to erase the anti-Zionist and anti-Semitic resolutions from the agenda.

Barring this, Canada must be prepared to speak the truth. Canadian officials should make very clear that their participation must not be construed as approval of the hateful resolutions. And they should declare unequivocally that Canada will not be a party to any effort to disparage, delegitimize and dehumanize not only a member-state of the UN and a fellow democracy, but an entire nation and religion.

On July 12, The CJN quoted foreign affairs spokesperson Michael O'Shaughnessy as saying that Canada has "strongly maintained its position that any linkages between Zionism and racism are unacceptable." Canada must, in Durban, give tangible expression to this sentiment.

Finally, Canada must express, in the strongest possible terms, its concern about the serious damage to the integrity of the conference caused by the determined efforts by Arabs and their international supporters to hijack and politicize the proceedings for overtly partisan purposes.

Civilized nations have too much invested in the conference to allow the process of historic reconciliation amongst diverse racial and religious communities to be compromised in such a despicable and mischievous fashion.

Canada, as a charter member of the United Nations and as a country whose status in the international community is so tightly linked to the integrity of the UN, must do all that it can to protect and sustain that integrity and ultimately, its own as well.

Secretary General Kofi Annan right, leads Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon into a meeting at the United Nations in New York on March 21, 2001. It was the first face-to-face meeting between the two men. The UN is once again being used as a forum for Israel's enemies to bash the Jewish state.

Memories of an old synagogue

In pre-Hitler Germany, the city of Essen, an important industrial city in western Germany, had a splendid synagogue. It was a very large structure, which was considered by experts to be outstandingly beautiful as well. It spoke of the kind of optimism that testified to the pervasive belief in the permanence of Jewish life in Germany.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

But on the night of Nov. 9-10, 1938, this optimism was shattered – 1,100 places of prayer were torched, and the Essen synagogue was amongst the victims. Only the outside walls remained standing, silently accusing the inhabitants of the city of having been accomplices of the Nazis.

For some time, the building became a place for industrial exhibitions, but in 1979 another fire ravaged it and, since the structure required considerable reconstitution and the spirit of the times had radically changed, thoughts turned toward rededicating the building to its original Jewish purpose.

Though it did not become once again a place for prayer, it now served as a place of remembrance and warning – a historical/political forum that documented a past that people wanted to forget. In this capacity, the old synagogue became so popular that it attracted some 30,000 visitors a year.

More recently, visitors are reminded not only of the devastating prejudice and its evil consequences that characterized National Socialism and warned against anti-Semitism and any kind of discrimination, it also became witness to the vitality of Jewish life itself. The new historical section that has now become a living museum explains to visitors the nature and the vitality of Jewish life, and also emphasizes the fact that courageous Jews had opposed the desecration of the temple and thereby had exposed themselves to persecution. Courage in the face of tyranny was an underreported aspect of those days.

If it should ever be your privilege to visit Essen and see the old synagogue in its renewed splendour, you will have an occasion to sign your name in a book of memory. Special attention is given to those who once lived in the city, who perhaps went to school there, and they especially are invited to share their impression with other visitors and perhaps manage to re-establish relationships long lost.

The building is thus more than a museum; it is a living place and enhances the welfare of the community by involving it in reliving the memory of days past. It is, in this respect, a monument to the "New Germany," which acknowledges the past with its evils, but resolutely tries to go a different way.

The midsummer report

There are not many occasions in a lifetime that someone can feel truly happy. At this moment, I do not believe that it would be possible for things to get any better than they are right now. As I sit here typing this column (after a very hectic day!), the most stressful thing on my mind is whether or not the weather will be nice tomorrow. Despite camp being a demanding and intense experience for a staff member, it is still the place to be over any other possible summer job. Camp Kadimah 2001 has started out at a great pace and the momentum has only continued.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

I do not know anyone who does not look forward to the summer. For as long as I can remember, summer has meant going to camp and being in what I have always considered to be my ideal place. Camp is something sacred in the sense that it is only six very special weeks, yet it is much more than that.

Those who have never gone to camp have problems understanding the whole "camp thing." They cannot figure out how children who cannot put their television remote controls down during the entire year flock to summer camp where they live in cramped cabins, eat not-so-great food and get all sorts of bug bites. The truth is simple: camp brings out people's fundamental natures. It forces people from different stages in their lives with many diverse opinions, values and beliefs to live together in a communal environment and ultimately (and hopefully) have fun. While school may teach a specified curriculum, children who go to camp get an edge on just about everything else.

In many ways, camp is just a preparation for what we all have to deal with later in life. We are forced to confront awkward and difficult situations. We must learn to be tactful but honest, and most importantly, we must learn about respect.

I think that besides my family, camp has had the greatest influence on me. Some of the most pivotal events in my life have taken place here, both good and not-so-good. One particular memory comes from the summer of 1995 when my bubbie passed away quite suddenly. No matter where or what I would have been doing during the time, the experience would have been terrible, but camp provided a very stable atmosphere for me at the time. After returning there following the shivah, I was blown away at how my counsellors and friends rallied around me. The genuine nature of those who took the time to care has always left an imprint in my summer memories.

Although I do not want it to sound like a cliché, camp really is a summer family. Over the years, I have seen how important it is to give back to what was given to me as a camper. Hopefully, the pattern will continue as long as camp does.

This particular summer has been one of the best that I have experienced. The only sad times for me lately have occurred while I'm trying to fall asleep at night, when I think about the day that I will not be spending my summer in such a wonderful place. The "real world" might be black and white but camp is a place of true technicolour. In one way or another, all campers and staff find their niche, where they can express themselves, be themselves and learn to accept and deal with many different issues that will face them throughout their lives.

Lifetime friendships are, of course, the usual result of this type of power summer. The incredible bond I have with my camp friends has developed over the years. There are those who I speak to on a daily basis and those who I lose touch with for a while and then meet again, feeling as if we were never apart.

Many people my age will maintain that they are "too old" for camp and that they are way past the "camp thing." Although I know that the time will come for me eventually when it will not be possible to go to camp anymore, I will envy those who still are able to. Until then, however, I will love every moment of this place, especially the rainy/cold days, the loud meals and the damp cabins, because no matter what, any day at camp is better than a day in the real world.

A Jewish summer experience

With the summer in full bloom, most of your friends are probably away, either at home or overseas. Groups of friends who have spent their entire lives together split off for the summer, creating interesting and different experiences.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

Many of my friends have come to camp with me over the years, but a handful of others have not. I find it fascinating that you can spend entire years with people, but then they go to camp in the summer and you don't hear from them until school starts again. The exciting thing about this is the experiences that are shared when summer is over.

I have friends who go to Camp Hatikvah, Camp Modin in the States, B'nai Brith Camp and other popular summer camps. When we talk about our summers, we often compare notes on programs and staff activities. The ideas that we gain by doing this are invaluable. I have brought some of my friends' ideas to my camp and I know that my other friends have brought back some of my ideas to theirs.

Why is this important? Since the camps that we all attend are Jewish camps, they offer a Jewish experience. Whether it is just saying a few prayers, or talking Hebrew at meals, each camp does its part in contributing to a Jewish child's life.

Combining ideas from other camps can create an even more positive Jewish experience. One small example that happened at my camp involved a counsellor who went to a camp in the States and then came back to my camp the year after with a new tune to Shalom Elechem. Soon all the kids were singing it.

Having a Jewish experience at camp is valuable because it provides something the school cannot. While school is often filled with tests and essays, at camp, Judaism comes in the form of songs or plays. More often than not there are children who do not attend a Jewish day school. The summer provides them with an opportunity to learn something new about themselves in a way that will stay with them for years.

At Camp Massad, a Hebrew immersion camp, many of the kids learn all of their Hebrew. Even Massad's camp director in 1996 learned virtually all of his Hebrew there. It always amazes me what kids can retain. Massad doesn't drill proper grammar into the minds of the campers, but somehow, just through conversation, the kids learn plural, singular, masculine, feminine, past, present, etc. Before the campers come, we write out Hebrew words on a sheet of paper and tack the sheet to the cabin wall, and every year the campers remember what words were tacked on their wall the year before. Our songs are all in Hebrew and kids always remember the lines. When they ask what the line means in English, they are able to learn a significant amount of the language through something other than schoolbooks.

Jewish camps are also valuable in that they are able to teach in a way that other Jewish organizations and institutions cannot: through creativity, friendships and fun. While these words can be used to describe other Jewish places, nothing compares with spending a summer away from your parents and still being able to learn something new.

The Kirshner File

Intimations of genocide in a killing field

A scrawny white cow meanders lazily through the field, stopping occasionally to munch grass and to defecate.

The field, abutting bright green rice paddies and fertile farmland in the Cambodian village of Choeung Ek, is broken up by about 15 shallow, innocuous looking depressions.

Sheldon Kirshner in Cambodia

The corpses of nearly 9,000 Cambodians were heaved into these pits in the mid and late 1970s.

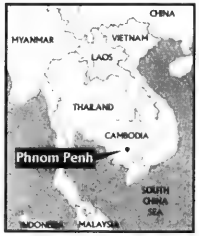
Exhumed in 1980, they were the victims of a senseless slaughter perpetrated by the infamous Khmer Rouge regime.

Led by a radical and demented revolutionary named Pol Pot, the Khmer Rouge ruled this benighted nation from April 1975 until its ouster in January 1979.

During this tragic period, which came on the heels of a war that engulfed Cambodia, the Khmer Rouge unleashed a reign of terror that has few precedents in history.

Dedicated to transforming Cambodia into a Maoist, agrarian society, Pol Pot and his henchmen emptied the cities of its inhabitants, abolished normal institutions, cut off Cambodia from the world and launched a genocidal campaign against intellectuals and the middle class. They branded these Cambodians as "parasites" who deserved death.



By the tens of thousands, they were herded to killing fields, such as Choeung Ek, and then tortured, murdered and thrown into mass graves.

These horrific events, memorialized in a sombre litany of movies and books, constitute Cambodia's Holocaust.

Choeung Ek is only 15 kilometres from the dusty and frenetic capital, Phnom Penh, but the trip by minibus takes almost an hour.

The rutted two-lane road, so typical of roads in Cambodia, is congested with traffic – ox carts, motor scooters, cars, trucks and buses.

At the gate in front of the killing field, six bedraggled and physically stunted beggars, all under the age of 10, mob a small group of western visitors, their hands reaching out in supplication.

In a corner, a legless beggar, his face an impassive mask, sits on a low wooden platform with four wheels. A human stump exuding immense dignity, he is a silent and compelling figure.

This poor soul is a living, breathing casualty of a bygone era, when Cambodians knew nothing but strife and bloodshed.

In 1970, Cambodia was sucked into the maelstrom of war as U.S. and South Vietnamese forces invaded to rout the armies of the Viet Cong and North Vietnam.

The land was sown with millions of mines, and these deadly objects maimed and killed innumerable Cambodians.

Even now, buried mines disfigure ordinary Cambodians, and the results are staggering. All over Cambodia, visitors encounter men without limbs, women missing arms, and children bereft of fingers.

It is heartbreaking spectacle, exacerbated by the fact that Cambodia, a developing nation still licking its wounds, cannot afford to look after its less fortunate citizens. There is no such thing here as a social safety net.

Amputees are reduced to begging. Still more terrible to behold, especially for a Jewish visitor whose parents are Holocaust survivors, are killing fields like Choeung Ek, where Khmer Rouge atrocities took place far from prying eyes.

The evidence of this murderous rampage has been deliberately preserved by the government for the benefit of the present generation and future generations.

In a memorial stupa resembling a Buddhist temple, the bleached skulls of some 9,000 Cambodians, ruthlessly mown down by anonymous executers, are packed closely together and displayed on 10 shelves behind glass panels.

The shelves reach dizzying heights, testifying to the unforgivable crimes carried out in the supposed name of progress.

The skulls of the victims.

Nearby is a crude sign, in Cambodian and English, claiming that the killings were of a more evil nature than those committed during the Holocaust.

By all accounts, one million Cambodians were wantonly murdered by the Khmer Rouge. Cambodia was torn asunder by these killers, who have yet to face justice. The scale of Cambodia's genocide beggars and scars the imagination.

But was the carnage in Choeung Ek, as the sign claims, worse than the systematic extermination of six million Jews by the Nazis and their collaborators?

What finally matters is that people – innocent people – were randomly and ruthlessly killed for the sake of a crazy ideology.

Like Adolf Hitler, Pol Pot dreamed of restructuring and reordering his universe. The end justified the means.

The lives of Cambodians, and Jews, were snuffed out in a blinding flash by murderers who were absolutely convinced they were making the world a better place.

In Choeung Ek, as well as in Auschwitz and in Rwanda, their brutal and chilling handiwork is there for all to see and ponder.

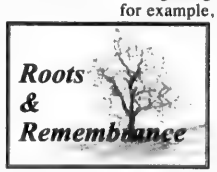
Jewish Life

Shining a light on Jewish names

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

A talmudic source indicates that after Alexander the Great conquered Palestine in 333 BCE, all Jewish boys of priestly families born the following year were named Alexander as a form of tribute.



Like his namesake, a contemporary Alexander is proving a skilled and savvy conqueror. Alexander Beider, the Paris-based onomastician, has marched from one province of Jewish names to the next in a bold campaign to illuminate their various etymologies. Having conquered the territory of surnames, he has now entered the field of given names.

His new book, A Dictionary of Ashkenazic Given Names: Including Their Origins, Structures, Pronunciations and Migrations, is being published this month by Avotaynu.

Beider's two previous major works, A Dictionary of Jewish Surnames from the Russian Empire and A Dictionary of Jewish Surnames from the Kingdom of Poland, were ground-breaking studies that combined long theoretic introductions with exhaustive compilations of surnames.

Like its predecessors, the new book features a long theoretical introduction and a seemingly exhaustive compilation of about 15,000 Ashkenazic given names, all linked to a pool of about 735 root names. It traces many names back to the talmudic period or the Crusades, documents known usages with dates, places, sources and notes, and maps out derivations and variations.

Regarding the root name Aleksander, for example, Beider notes that it has long been considered a shem ha-kodesh (holy name) despite its Greek origin. Its informal or "hypocoristic" form is Sander, and its vernacular forms include Ziskind and Zusman. Variations include Sanderman, Zenderlin, Zandrik and Shanke.

Like many great scholars, Beider achknowledges that he stands upon the shoulders of giants. They include Leopold Zunz, the 19th-century German-Jewish scholar, and Samuel ben Uri Shraga Phoebus, a 17th-century rabbi who compiled an early study of Jewish names.

Beider doesn't get any better than when delicately untangling historic misperceptions that obscure the origins of certain names. Regarding Shneyer, for instance, he notes: "Due to a folk etymology misinterpretation, the Hebrew spelling of this name coincided with the combinations of the two Hebrew words 'two' and 'light,' pronounced shnei and or respectively." Because of this association, some rabbis regarded the name as a shem ha-kodesh, suitable for use when calling someone up to the Torah.

Another erroneous folk etymology equated the name Fayvush with the Greek Phoibos and the Latin Phoebus, meaning "god of the sun." Consequently, Fayvush and its variants and derived forms were sometimes used as vernacular equivalents (kinnuim) for Samson, the biblical name derived from the Hebrew noun meaning "little sun."

The name Shrage, which derives from the Aramaic noun for candle, was often associated with Fayvush due to the erroneous connection of Fayvush with the sun. The true derivation of Fayvush is not Phoibos, however, but the Latin vivus, meaning "living, alive." Fayvush was created as an equivalent form of the Hebrew name Chaim (life) or Yechiel (similar derivation).

Some names seem to have multiple derivations and meanings. Nochum or Nachum, for instance, is derived simultaneously from the biblical prophet, from the Hebrew word meaning comfort, and as a short form of Menachem. Likewise, Sholem derives from the Hebrew noun for peace, but because of its closeness to Solomon, both names are sometimes used interchangeably.

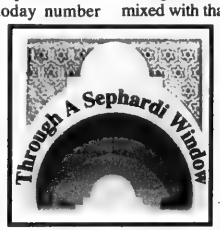
The very great penetration of biblical names among Jews needs no explanation. I was unaware until reading Beider, however, that various now-common names such as Abraham, Adam, Isaiah and Israel only came into common use among Ashkenazim in the Middle Ages.

These are only a few of many questions explored in Beider's latest magnum opus, which is a brilliant and monumental compilation.

Diefenbaker, Moroccan Jewry

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

For 1,000 years, North Africa hosted one of the largest Jewish communities in the Diaspora. While some may say that these communities have virtually vanished, the reality is that they have simply relocated. A case in point – Jews of Moroccan descent today number more than one million people worldwide, the single largest Jewish ethnic subgroup.



In the '50s, as emigration gained momentum, the vast majority heard the call of Zion and realized their dream by settling in Israel. Their second choice was France, close both geographically and in ideological terms. Moroccan Jews saw themselves as cosmopolitan, certainly more European than African. In any case, they already spoke the language.

After Israel or France came Canada. Canada you say! Indeed. The story of how Canada, of all places, became a home for the third largest community of Moroccan Jews in the world is a missing page in our history. Here it is, long overdue, but just as true.

The lure of all things American cast a spell on everyone, but the U.S. immigration laws and quotas made it nearly impossible to attain a visa. Canada was seen as a stable country, a sort of America "Lite." The then strong prevailing culture of the British and French, mixed with that of the Americans, made for a curious but desirable blend.

Canada, however, had its own set of immigration policies. An application for a visa from an exotic place like Arab Morocco was quite odd. If the applicant claimed to be a Moroccan and have the Jewish faith, then this was most bizarre. Jews in Morocco – preposterous! Who had ever heard of Jews in Morocco? Certainly not Ottawa. All applications remained unanswered and inactive.

In the '50s, there were probably fewer than a dozen Jews from Morocco in all of Canada. Those who were here were mostly male, young and single and had entered with passports from European countries. Among these young men were Eli Mimram and the late Albert Nidam. Fate brought the two then-recent immigrants to the attention of Toronto's Rabbi David Monson. It was reputed that the rabbi had a personal friendship with the prime minister, John Diefenbaker. Would the rabbi lobby on behalf of Moroccan Jewry?

Not only did Rabbi Monson arrange a meeting with the prime minister, he personally drove through the night with Mimram and Nidam in his own vehicle.

The minister of immigration, Ellen Fairclough, as well as another cabinet member, were asked to attend this meeting. Rabbi Monson, Mimram and Nidam presented the plight of the Jews in Morocco wishing to leave their country. The prime minister then asked for documentation, at which point Mimram produced the names of some 70 files buried in bureaucratic quagmire.

That very morning Diefenbaker gave orders to fast-track all applications for Moroccan Jews. The rest is history. One immigrant sponsored another, who sponsored another... Today the Canadian community of Jews of North Africa flourishes both in Toronto, where they number many thousand, and in Montreal where they number threefold as many. We have a community with centres and schools and services, whose members have succeeded in professions, business and the arts, and have contributed much to Canada in productivity, economy and creativity.

Reflections on Richler

Mordecai Richler, Canadian Jewish Novelist

Often regarded as a black humorist, Mordecai Richler's novels had a far greater range and depth of social commentary than that term implies. He both celebrated and satirized the Jewish experience in Canada, and his work is full of pungently funny dialogue and politically incorrect observations.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz (1959), described by its author as the adventures of a teenage, working-class Jewish kid on the make in Montreal around 1949, is a modern classic. Duddy's rise and fall in business, as he schemes to buy land and exploits everyone around him, is rendered with both comedy and pathos.

The largely immigrant Jewish community of an earlier era – insecure and wary of ugly Jewish stereotypes – was resentful and outraged. In time, with a growing sense of security, the next generation was able to accept Duddy and its author with equanimity and even appreciation. These positive feelings about him grew ever stronger as he exposed the history of anti-Semitism in the Catholic Church of Quebec and the animus of many French Canadians.

There are two major tendencies in Richler's narrative approach: satire and social realism. These create the acerbic vision that is the hallmark of his fiction. They led to a kind of repetition in both theme and manner in most of his novels.

He found his subject matter in the area around St. Urbain Street and The Main in Montreal. An immigrant Jewish ghetto, these streets have become celebrated as Richler territory in a plethora of stories, novels, books of essays, films, articles, and lectures.

Jake Hersh, the protagonist of the book St. Urbain's Horseman (1971), finds a fantasy hero in his mysterious cousin Joey whom Jake believes tracks down Nazi war criminals. The Horseman represents the heroic spirit of Jewry in a time of great moral confusion. Ironically, it seems likely that the real Joey is not much better than a common thug, but Jake clings to his heroic fantasy as a remedy for his recurrent nightmares about Dr. Joseph Mengele and for his middle-aged obsession with and disgust at the ultimate facts of physical decline and death. St. Urbain's Horseman is an ambitious and impressive novel. It's funny, sad and powerful by turns.

When Solomon Gursky Was Here (1989) was published, I interviewed Richler on the telephone and asked if his book was based, however loosely, on the history of the Montreal Bronfman family. His answer was a curt and emphatic "No," but the similarities are striking. Ephraim Gursky, the maverick son of a rich Jewish family ends up as a king of shaman among the Inuit. He eventually settles in Lower Canada and establishes a prosperous and respectable distillery firm.

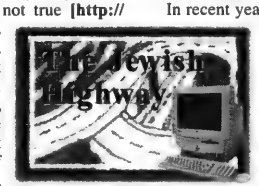
Barney's Version (1997), perhaps the best of Richler's novels, is structured around the three marriages of Barney Panofsky, a television producer with Alzheimer's disease. It is both poignant and wildly funny.

Richler's novels suggest that "the idea of a Jew" is very much like the idea of a Canadian, for Canada is a land of minorities, regions, and disguised ghettos. Is that Richler's appeal to his countrymen? Is that why he is never considered as other than a Canadian writer?

Judaism and gossip

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Did you read on the Internet how a famous fashion designer once uttered a racist remark on the Oprah Show and was told to leave immediately? If you did, forget about it. It's not true [http://www.urbanlegends.com/ulz/tommy.html]. Although the Internet can be a wonderful source of knowledge, it has probably become the world's biggest breeding ground of malicious rumours, scurrilous innuendo and good old gossip.



Or as Judaism would look at it, bad old gossip. The Internet may be new, but gossip has been around for thousands of years and Judaism has quite a bit to say about it.

Gossip in Hebrew is usually translated as lashon hara, literally the evil tongue. A piece of gossip may be true and it may have been said without malice but that does not make it any more acceptable in Jewish law [http://www.jewish.com/askarabbi/Ethics/Lashon_hara_and_dishonesty/]. According to the Sha'arei Shalom Congregation Web site of Ashland, Mass., "the rabbis teach that lashon hara is like killing three people because it destroys the reputation of the victim, damages the perceptions of the listener, and diminishes the standing of the speaker." [http://www.rjca.org/lashon.html]

One of the greatest proponents of codifying the laws against lashon hara was Rabbi Yisrael Meir Kagan (1838-1933), known as the Chofetz Chaim [http://www.torah.org/learning/lashon/]. The Chofetz Chaim lists 31 commandments which may be violated when a person speaks or listens to lashon hara, including: "In righteousness shall you judge your neighbour" and "You shall not go about as a talebearer among your people" [http://www.ahavat-israel.com/ahavat/am/gossip.asp].

In recent years, the Chofetz Chaim Heritage Foundation has carried on Rabbi Kagan's work and steps up its efforts at this time of year. On July 29, we mark Tisha b'Av, known as the time when national calamities have hit the Jews. But instead of blaming outside forces, the Talmud says that the cause of the destruction of the Second Temple was the senseless hatred and ill-will displayed among Jews. Since gossip and ill-will are very much contemporary issues within Judaism, the Chofetz Chaim Foundation has created videos and other programs to spread the message about lashon hara [http://www.kesserisrael.org/KesserMesser/Tisha B'Av99.pdf].

Cutting out gossip may sound fine in theory. But can it work in the real world? Rabbi David Bassous examines whether we have the right to discuss the private lives of politicians or celebrities. "To report on a politician's private dealings, if it sheds significant light on his character, may be acceptable. This is because knowledge of the politician's character helps voters make an informed decision at election time. However, a celebrity's private life is of no relevance to the public and should not be reported on without the celebrity's permission." [http://home.earthlink.net/~etzahaim/halakha/confid.html]

What do you do if you want to report the irresponsible behaviour of a co-worker while respecting the rules of lashon hara? According to the Professional Ethics and Halakha Web site, there are four situations when you are not only permitted, but obligated to speak negatively about others:

- to help the person spoken about;
- to help or protect those negatively affected by the person being spoken about;
- to prevent a community dispute; and
- to help others learn from the first person's faults. [http://www.darchenoam.org/ethics/GOSSIP/workplace.htm]

And what about psychotherapy? How effective can your treatment be if you feel limited expressing your negative feelings about others? Sanford Drob is a psychologist at Bellevue Hospital Center in New York and has written a fascinating article on lashon hara. He acknowledges that therapy may involve expressing negative feelings about others but says that it should never be an end unto itself. "If after many weeks and months of psychotherapy a patient continues to 'unburden' him or herself about the misdeeds and injustices of others, I begin to suspect the 'unburdening.' And the fixation upon the past, to be a source of the patient's problems rather than an effort towards their resolution." [http://www.newkabbalah.com/losh.html]

So how do you break the gossip habit? Slowly. Choose an hour daily during which you will make a deliberate effort to speak no evil. Once that becomes comfortable, gradually expand your gossip-free period. And how does the Internet fit into the resolution to cut down on lashon hara? Very conveniently. You can kick off your own campaign by making your anti-Lashon Harah pledge online [http://www.anshe.org/machsomlifi.htm].

סין וזכויות האדם

שיטה לשיפור הזכרון

GRADUATE DIPLOMA PROGRAM OF HOLOCAUST AND GENOCIDE EDUCATION

The Diploma Program is a collaborative project of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) at the University of Toronto and the Holocaust Centre of Toronto (UJA FEDERATION).

It is specifically designed to meet the needs of teachers who elect to teach units in the current Ontario curriculum concerning Holocaust and intellectual dimensions of other genocide. It will also be of interest to educators working in community colleges, the media and social services.

The Program is to be taken part-time, one evening a week and consists of five courses: four core required courses and one elective. Courses include: The Holocaust: A Social History; Holocaust and Genocide Education: Curriculum and Teaching Practices; Contemporary Genocide: An Interdisciplinary and Comparative Approach; Holocaust and Genocide Education Through Literature and Film; Anne Frank in Life and Death.

To obtain a brochure and further information, please contact Dr. Carole Ann Reed at 416-635-2883 ext. 144 or 416-923-6641 ext. 6953.

Frank Wilson

Wilson new JNF Toronto president

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Frank Wilson's long history of community activism evolved out of a love of baseball.

Wilson, Jewish National Fund of Toronto's new president, arrived here from New York – where he worked on the election campaigns of both John and Robert Kennedy – in 1964 and joined B'nai Brith in order to play on one of its baseball teams.

Wilson, who replaces Sandy Posluns, now president of JNF Canada, took on a number of positions in B'nai Brith, eventually becoming national vice-president from 1986 to 1991.

As well, Wilson, who still plays fast pitch baseball, has volunteered for such organizations as the Bloorview Children's Hospital, Juvenile Diabetes Association, Muscular Dystrophy Association (Jerry Lewis Telethon) and the Easter Seal Society, and he is a director of the Reena Foundation.

As chair of Maccabi Canada (Ontario region) from 1994 to 1998, he was in Israel when the bridge collapsed during the 1997 opening ceremonies of the Maccabi Games.

He has always been active in politics, he says, because he wants the government to understand that Jews have a voice, and he has worked on the political campaigns of both Conservatives and Liberals because "it is important to be heard by all influences."

Wilson has been involved with JNF for about seven years and was a vice-president since 1994. "If I believe in a cause, I participate in every way I can. When I get involved, I get involved.

"JNF provides about 90 percent of the infrastructure of Israel. [Since 1901] about 210 million trees have been planted.

"I get the most wonderful feeling when I plant a tree in Israel; I am giving a life to something. I planted my first tree behind Hadassah Hospital after visiting a naval base and I started crying. It is a very emotional experience to put your hands in that soil. It is part of our heritage."

JNF is also involved in forest protection, agricultural research and development and tourism infrastructure. It helps to alleviate the water shortage in Israel by constructing reservoirs, dams, additional waterworks and drainage facilities throughout the country. "Water is gold in Israel," he says.

He considers his one-year position – which is renewable three times – as one of coach. "I have a volunteer base of professional, caring people, and my duty is to ensure that the organization is raising substantial funds.

"I also have to make sure the well-being of the organization is being enhanced through new programs and a strong youth contingent. The work of JNF has to be introduced to a whole new generation."

JNF volunteers get a lot out of their work, says Wilson. "We like them to interact with people and have fun. They also get a sense of satisfaction for having accomplished something."

One program he would like to see reinstated during his term is the Tu b'Shvat Tree for Tree program. "If a tree is planted in Israel, we will plant a tree here."

He would also like to reacquaint people with how the organization runs and talk about its goals. "It will be like presenting a business plan."

He is taking over leadership at a good time, Wilson says, because the 100th anniversary of JNF begins in September. "I am already starting to take names for a tour to Israel in May 2002. We plan on it being a large and exciting trip."

Forest Valley founder mentored 'Fine' camp staff

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For many local baby boomers, the name Bert Fine is associated with early summer camp memories. The founder of Bathurst Manor Day Camp (later Forest Valley Day Camp) died on July 4 at the Harold and Grace Baker Centre of complications from a degenerative nerve condition. He was 81.

Fine's basic philosophy was that camp should be fun and safe, said his son Jonathan, a Toronto lawyer.

He had always dreamed of having his own camp, said his sister Frances Sobel.

A native of Toronto, Fine grew up in the Bathurst and College Street area and attended Harbord Collegiate and the University of Toronto. His parents, Myer – who sold mattresses at Simpson's – and Lillian, were from Russia and England respectively.

An athletic youngster who fought in the riot at Christie Pits, Fine became an amateur boxer, and later, a physical education teacher at Forest Hill Junior High School. During World War II, he served in the Royal Canadian Air Force as an airplane mechanic based in Ontario.

After the war, he worked at several overnight camps, and served as director of Camp New Moon in the early 1950s.

His own day camp, established in 1955, grew from less than 50 campers to more than 1,000, Jonathan said. The camp was also open after hours and on weekends, as was the swim club.

"As I recall, [the swim club] wasn't a commercial venture," Jonathan said. "I got the impression that it was a social venture. That was the type of guy [my dad] was."

Fine also worked with his staff members to help them make the transition from camper to counsellor – or teenager to adult, recalled Jonathan, who was both a camper and staff member.

In the late 1980s, Fine sold the land to the Board of Education, which then leased it back. His daughter Jennifer Fine Pezim ran the camp for about five years until the lease ran out, said Jonathan.

Among Fine's volunteer work, he served on the North York Committee of Adjustments for two decades and volunteered at what is now the Bathurst Jewish Centre as well as at the Baycrest Centre, teaching swimming therapy.

"He was a good guy," said Jonathan. In a eulogy at the funeral he spoke of his father's vision in creating the camp, his courage in facing his illness, and his sense of humour about life and death.

Fine, who was married and divorced twice, was the father of five children. "It was very easy being a kid – and especially a teenager – in my dad's house," said Jonathan. "He had a very good sense of what was right, how to avoid conflict and how to resolve conflict."

Fine is survived by his children Jonathan, Jennifer, Adam, Maren and Josh; five grandchildren; and his sister.

'Superb diagnostician, gentle, compassionate'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Dr. Henry Goldenberg, who was recognized as a superb diagnostician with a gentle, compassionate nature, died on July 4 at Scarborough Grace Hospital at the age of 82.

His father Benjamin came from Galicia. Shortly after his arrival in Canada, he met and married Pearl Segal and opened a small shirt manufacturing factory.

Goldenberg worked in the factory after school and on Sundays. Throughout high school, he consistently achieved high academic standing and later received scholarships and awards to attain his honours bachelors of science.

He enlisted in the army and completed his four-year medical degree. In his final year, he married his childhood sweetheart Helen Cooper from Chesley, Ont. They were married for 58 years.

While he was in the army, they moved to Barrie, Belleville, Kingston and later, back to Vancouver where he had once interned. He was then promoted to captain and sent to England and Germany.

Goldenberg was among the second group of Canadians to enter Bergen-Belsen, a scene which haunted him throughout his life. At the camp, he found his wife's cousins, and by tracing her family, he became interested in genealogy and developed a hobby of researching family trees, which ultimately included thousands of names.

After the war, he spent three years at Toronto East General Hospital before writing and passing his Canadian fellowship exams in internal medicine.

Dr. Henry Goldenberg

He spent a year doing research in the internationally famous hematology lab at Tuft's Medical College in Boston and became the first Canadian to work under the direction of a top hematologist there.

He joined the staff at Mount Sinai Hospital in 1951 and started a private practice. His reputation as a skilled diagnostician spread among his peers and Goldenberg became known as the compassionate doctor who would take time to accompany frightened patients who were undergoing transfusions or chemotherapy.

Goldenberg was a biblical scholar and had a great love of music.

Thirteen years ago, he began to develop Alzheimer's disease, but his disposition never changed.

OBITUARIES

Himel a passionate advocate for human rights

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Irving Himel, a passionate advocate for human rights and defender of civil liberties, died here earlier this month. He was 86.

Himel was remembered by friends and family members as one of Canada's foremost opponents of discriminatory laws, especially those that prohibited the sale of properties to certain ethnic and religious groups.

In 1947, Himel helped found the Canadian Association for Civil Liberties (now called the Canadian Civil Liberties Association) and was its first executive secretary and general counsel.

"He had a talent for bringing people together. Justice was his forté," said his last surviving sibling, brother Sydney, a lawyer.

Among Himel's best known accomplishments was getting Ottawa to repeal discriminatory laws aimed at restricting Chinese immigration to Canada.

Born to Polish emigre parents, Himel graduated from Osgoode Hall law school in 1938. He specialized in civil liberties, labour and immigration law.

As a young lawyer in the post-war period, Himel was active on a committee that pressed for a constitutional bill of rights. Those efforts culminated in the adoption of the Canadian Bill of Rights in 1960.

As a legal adviser to the Chinese-Canadian community, he played a key role in the federal government's repeal of the Chinese Immigration Act in 1947.

In the early 1950s, Himel led delegations before the premier of Ontario and the cabinet to urge the enactment of provincial human rights statutes and legislation outlawing discrimination in employment, housing and on public signs. As a result, Ontario established a human rights code and the Fair Employment Practices Act.

He also pressed the federal government to enact fair employment laws.

In 1984, Himel established the yearly Alan Coatsworth Lecture under the auspices of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews (now held by Canadian Jewish Congress) to honour the legacy of the interfaith advocate and founder of the Young Maccabees.

Himel "was absolutely committed to human rights," said Toronto lawyer and community activist Bert Raphael, who delivered a eulogy at Holy Blossom Temple last week. "He was a mentor, a role model and first class gentleman."

Himel was pre-deceased by his first wife, Anne; brothers Henry and Percy; and a sister, Bertha.

When a spouse converts, he or she is considered fully Jewish, the rabbi noted.

The divorce rate among intercultural couples (including interfaith couples) is 68 percent, 20 percent higher than average, he said.

As a Conservative rabbi and a member of that movement's rabbinic umbrella, the Rabbinical Assembly, Rabbi Booth cannot participate in or even attend a marriage ceremony between a Jew and a non-Jew, but he does offer pre-marital counselling to interfaith couples.

"I do it for two reasons," he said. "I think it raises the likelihood the relationship will last, because divorce is horrible. And if they're in my office, there's a possibility the non-Jew will pick up an interest in Judaism and possibly convert."

To increase the odds of Jewish-Jewish marriage, he advised, it is "far less important to talk about intermarriage than it is to build a sukkah together. That's a lot of armour, creating someone who wants Judaism in their home. Judaism is not about all the things we cannot do."

2001: A Men's Odyssey – Toronto hosts FJMC convention

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Football, beer and sex. Not what you'd consider the basis for a synagogue men's club. But that was exactly how the brotherhood at a small Virginia synagogue got off the ground.

When three founding members met with Rabbi David Booth of Rodef Shalom Congregation, they decided that potential members would be interested in football, beer and sex. With the rabbi's encouragement, they planned a four-part series that featured beer, kosher pizza, and the Monday night football game, all preceded by Rabbi Booth's discussion of sex and healthy relationships in a Jewish context.

Other examples of innovative programming were featured at a "mitzvah mall" at the recent Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs (FJMC) biennial convention, held at the Regal Constellation Hotel from July 11 to 15. A teen suicide awareness program, a cholent cook-off, a men's cookbook, and a machzor intended for families with children between the ages of 6 and 12 were among the more unusual programs.

A recent joint Canadian/American program was the building of a guest house at Camp Ramah in Utterson, Ont., by the FJMC's Great Lakes region, which includes Ontario and nearby U.S. states.

"Our job is to involve Jews in Jewish life," said Rabbi Charles Simon, executive director of the FJMC (www.fjmc.org), the 72-year-old umbrella serving 275 synagogue brotherhood organizations.

"This is a real grass-roots organization. We don't have machers," said the rabbi, who works with two full-time staff and one part-timer.

FJMC publications such as the brand-new Building the Faith, A Book of Inclusion for Dual-Faith Families, are a relatively recent project, instituted about a dozen years ago.

Other issues addressed in FJMC publications are Hebrew literacy, Jewish observance and men's health. The books are designed mainly as a tool for lay people to teach others about topics like how to make a seder more meaningful, lead a havdalah service or comfort mourners, Rabbi Simon said.

Men's clubs are attracting younger men than in the past, said the rabbi. Among the services offered by the FJMC umbrella are training programs that teach men "to challenge themselves religiously."

Earlier this year the FJMC sponsored an international "World Wide [Tfillin] Wrap," an outgrowth of one synagogue's program. The individual program attracted 120 people; the global one, an estimated 40,000. Some of the clubs enhanced the program by writing rap songs or serving wrap sandwiches, Rabbi Simon said.

In a keynote address at the conference, Rabbi Simon said that many synagogues tend to reflect the priorities of staff rather than their communities, and suggested that overworked clergy would be better served by using the laity, specifically men's clubs and sisterhoods, to help them.

A proponent of marketing theory, Rabbi Simon suggested that clubs set goals such as membership growth, new programs and targeting of future leaders; and determine strategies to implement them.

Although most Canadian men's club members – unlike their American counterparts – attend non-egalitarian or partially egalitarian Conservative synagogues, they share common concerns, said Sheldon Serota, a past president of the men's club at Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

"The beauty of the men's clubs is that [we] deal with the real world, and everyday issues. We may practise religion differently, but our religion and our relationship with Israel is at the core of our being."

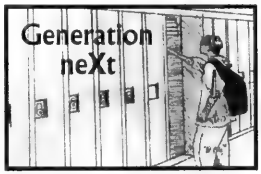
How do we define our 'support' for Israel?

A SOFTER SOLIDARITY?

We are small but we are many
We are young but we unite,
To the candle of continuity
You are the flame, and we're the light.

By GILA ASHTOR

Assuming that all Jews subscribe to a collective loyalty with Israel, that all Canadian manifestations of yiddishkeit share the same Zionist dream, that every Jewish youth exercises the visions of a better future, we ought to wonder if a subscription to the Jerusalem Post, or an avid following of Israeli politics really justifies our claim to solidarity. We ought to question our definition of support if we are to boast our successes, if we are to determine our acts of commitment, if we are to count ourselves righteous, if we are to understand our positions and if we are to defend our goals.



As the tension in Israel increases, our alignment with the tiny country beckons a re-evaluation, an assessment of sorts. In my most recent encounter with an Israeli citizen, Ofer Abramovitz, we discussed the connection between Israel and modern Jewry in the Diaspora.

"You North Americans, you come here for the summer, for vacation, you swim in our seas and tan on our beaches, but you don't know what life is. You don't know what it is to survive. You say [that] you love Israel, but what kind of Israel do you know?"

Echoed by Abramovitz is the idea held by many Israelis that we, in our air-conditioned homes, nice cars, and fancy offices, do not appreciate the hardship our brothers in Israel are facing on a day-to-day basis; that we only know of Tel-Aviv what the newspapers reveal; that any sympathy we might have is a reaction to the media techniques implemented around the globe.

And maybe that's true.

Why, after all, must we send our sons to the battlefield as testament of our faith? Why must we travel in times of danger and immediate threats? To prove our beliefs? And why must we explain a solidarity that we feel in our hearts?

Is it not enough that we study there and travel there, pray for them, think of them, laugh with them and cry with them? Is it not enough that we actively support Jewish funds, organizations and foundations? What really is solidarity, and what is to say that ours is too soft?

In all the chaos and destruction that hangs in the air in Israel, it is no wonder that we seem too comfortable, too carefree, too content. When the violence is as suffocating as the humidity, it is no surprise that Israelis see us as people that may taste the surface of their pain but will never be able to digest it.

And, in fact, they are right. For as long as our communication with Israel is limited to the news, long distance phone cards and the Internet, we will remain far away from a land that needs our closeness, but close enough to a people that is never too far. We need each other, and while the nuances of solidarity may vary, our collective appeal to support Israel will not.

The sabra, a term used to identify a prickly fruit and the Israeli attitude that bears such close resemblance to it, is always saying that simply because he doesn't show his feelings does not mean he doesn't feel them.

We are North Americans, and while we cannot hide under the veil of Israeli behaviour, we too can explain that simply because we do not travel to Israel, reside on the West Bank or send our children to join the army, it does not subtract from the intensity of our passion and the truth behind our dreams.

We are one people, and for as long as both Jews in and around Israel accept their interdependence on one another, no enemy can threaten our survival, and no challenge can escape our solidarity.

Love is not measured by distance and neither is support. Even if it seems soft at times, it is every ounce of our solidarity that keeps us strong and together. May we never forget that.

Any one who wishes to contact me is encouraged to do so at isgila@home.com.

Jewish Studies at Queen's expands course offerings

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Five new Jewish studies courses are being offered at Queen's University this year – an eclectic mix reflecting the direction the Kingston, Ont. school's program in Jewish Studies is taking.

The undergraduate courses – Classics of Yiddish Literature in Translation, the Levant from the Late Bronze Age to the Coming of Rome, Contemporary Middle East: Violence and Peacemaking in the Arab Israeli Conflict, Judaism's Encounter with Science, and the Jewish Tradition and Literature in English – fall under the rubrics of German language and literature, classics, history, interdisciplinary studies, and English language and literature respectively.

"My view is that Jewish philosophy should be taught in a philosophy department, and Jewish history should be taught in the history department," said Gerald Tulchinsky, director of the program, in a telephone interview from his home in Kingston.

"I think Jewish philosophers should be talking to other philosophers and Jewish historians should be talking to other historians."

That approach is not unique, he noted. The University of Toronto is another example. "I just happen to agree [with their approach]," he said.

Since he took on the Jewish studies position two years ago – succeeding Rena Basser (formerly Zeidman), who is teaching three of this year's courses – Tulchinsky has sought colleagues in a variety of departments whose interests mesh with his own.

The new course on the Levant, for example, resulted from Tulchinsky's suggestion that it "would be wonderful to have a course on Jews in the classical world."

Jewish studies at Queen's date back to the 1980s, when a few courses were taught in the department of religious studies. Today, Jewish studies have "gone beyond a mere symbolic program, and it's now becoming structured into the Queen's undergraduate program," he said.

A historian who teaches a Jewish studies course on the Holocaust every other year, Tulchinsky has been with Queen's since 1966. Over that time he has seen the campus shift to a more multicultural outlook – and a more diverse student body. There's "no way" the Jewish studies program could have happened 35 years ago, he said.

"I think there's now much greater openness to the world, and to multiculturalism. I think windows have opened even at Queen's, which was a fusty, musty, crusty place."

While the Jewish student population remains relatively small – no more than 500 students out of 14,000, Tulchinsky estimates – there is an active Hillel, for which he is an advisory committee member.

But the Jewish studies program is not targeted only at Jewish students. Courses are open to all students and to community members interested in auditing lectures.

In fact, Tulchinsky sees the program in Jewish studies as representing "a kind of marriage of town and gown, and I'm really happy about that. I think it means that even as a small university in a relatively small Ontario city, there is interest."

In addition to a dozen credit courses, which may be counted toward a minor in Jewish studies, the program offers a lecture series – People and Ideas in Jewish History – now entering its third year.

Some of the upcoming lectures, given monthly by faculty members, will focus on Jews of Ancient Rome, Jews in the French Colonial Empire before the Revolution, Jews and the Slavery Issue, Jews in French Romantic Literature, Latin American Jewish Women Writers, and Heinrich Heine's Return to Judaism. Last year lectures attracted about 100 people, on average, said Tulchinsky.

Further information about the program in Jewish studies can be found at http://qsilver.queensu.ca/jewishstudies.

Admission is $10 for adults and $7 for students.

Mizrachi concert features Chaim Dovid

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish music star Chaim Dovid will make his first Canadian appearance at the Mizrachi Organization of Canada's summer concert.

South African-born Dovid (whose full name is Chaim Dovid Saracik) was inspired by noted musician and spiritual mentor Shlomo Carlebach to move to Israel, where he became committed to Orthodox practice and began composing songs.

Two of his early compositions appeared on the first album of the Diaspora Yeshiva Band. His CDs include Or Chadash, recorded in 1986; Open Up Your Gates; Songs for the Shabbos Table (produced in conjunction with Aish Hatorah); Lema'an Shemo; Hayom; and his most recent CD, L'Fanekha.

In 1997 he made his first major tours of the United States, which included a performance of Camp HASC, a camp for disabled children.

The event will be held Aug. 15 at 7:30 p.m. at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue. Proceeds will go towards several projects at yeshivot hesder and The Israel Solidarity Fund.

Rebels want new party, not new leader

Last issue, I began to examine the competing perspectives within the once solid Canadian Alliance. I acknowledged the earnestness of the "rebels" and recognized the weaknesses of Stockwell Day.

There were two things, however, that I promised to consider this week. The first is the accumulated sins of Stock Day that precipitated the "crisis of confidence" that in turn led to the revolt. Exactly what were the faults attributed to Day that made Chuck Strahl et al. feel they had no choice other than to bolt and thereby trigger the implosion of their own party?

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Was it the "dinosaur" thing? If so, they should check the record because Day never said it. A newspaper reported that someone had heard someone else say that at a campaign event Day had mused about the time of Creation.

Was it the gaffe on healthcare during that same election campaign? Well, Day never raised the spectre of two-tiered healthcare. It was another Alliance MP, Jason Kenney, who misspoke that one.

In reality, Day never committed any egregious error. True, he demonstrated a lack of judgment on a couple of occasions and was less than vigilant about consulting with his caucus. But that is a leader's prerogative. Just ask the Liberals if you're in any doubt. So if not that, then what?

Well, that question brings us to the second issue, namely, what is really behind the tragi-comedy of the "Alliance that wasn't"? Some have suggested that the revolt simply reflects a group of Manning loyalists who could not move beyond the loss of their man's leadership to the upstart Day. That suggestion is on the right track, but it goes much deeper.

Preston Manning had a vision of uniting the forces opposed to the Liberals and leading them to victory. His gambit, the creation of the Canadian Alliance, failed and Manning found himself stranded at the station after the train had left. He could never accept that turn of events and so he began the painstaking process of bringing about the destruction of the political entity he helped create.

That is why he has consistently foresworn any interest in replacing Day as the leader of the Alliance. His goal – the one shared by the core group of rebels – is to disband the Alliance and begin again. His rationalization is straightforward enough. The Alliance was supposed to be a tent large enough to include Tories and others. In the end, all that was accomplished was a name change for the Reform Party. It is also why no one has stepped forward to challenge Day for the leadership. The objective of this game is not to replace the leader, it's to replace the party.

Actor believes in miracles

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Benson Simmonds believes the power of unity and meditation can create miracles.

A Vancouver actor and adherent of Jewish mysticism, Simmonds hopes his next group meditation project will bring some much-needed peace to Israel.

"Thought consciousness is the key to change," he says. "We think we can't change the situation in Israel, but change starts with changing your thoughts. I guarantee something positive will happen."

Simmonds is organizing a large-scale prayer-in-unison in which participants at different locations in the Vancouver area chant the Shema Yisrael in harmony. As everyone utters the same mantra they will also be connected with a higher power, he says.

"The Shema is of such importance – it's more powerful than just thinking peace – because it is a very powerful prayer for healing."

At noon on Aug. 4, the peace project will have its first testing. Aiming to spread the word to as many in the community as possible, Simmonds is trying to get Vancouver rabbis, synagogues, Jews and non-Jews involved.

Eventually, he plans to bring the Shema meditation across Canada and beyond. A friend of Simmonds in Seattle is attempting to spread the word in that city on the same morning.

"What I'd love to do is make it a monthly thing and get it to grow so that literally hundreds of thousands people are making a change," Simmonds says.

"I just know that meditation works – I've learned to see miracles in life – and it's simple enough not to require too much of people. You look at your watch, and as long as we can tell time, it can be done. It's not really expecting too much."

Stating that the benefits of such a meditative peace project are twofold, Simmonds pointed out that both the person who prays and the receiver of a prayer profit from the prayer's energy and favourable effects. It's what he called "the act of being karmically repaid."

If we are united we can conquer, he says.

"There's just so much hatred for no reason, which is what destroyed the second temple," he says.

"The unfortunate part is that the only way we usually become united is through being united against something or somebody else, like the enemy of war. But really, we're fighting the enemy within. If we're united in a different way and we meditate on peace, then we bring an internal peace into our bodies which manifests in an external peace."

"He who would do good to another must do it in Minute Particulars. General Good is the plea of the scoundrel, hypocrite and flatterer."

UN official in S. Lebanon to probe disputed videotape

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — UN Undersecretary General Joseph Connor, head of a special UN team established to investigate the controversy surrounding a videotape filmed by the UNIFIL peacekeepers, arrived in Southern Lebanon Sunday to supervise his staff's work.

The existence of the video, which documents the return of a vehicle used by Hezbollah operatives who kidnapped three IDF soldiers last October, was disclosed early in July. The revelation came after months of UN denials that it had the tape.

The six UN officials working on Connor's team arrived in southern Lebanon last Thursday. On Sunday, Connor took part in a tour of the Shaba Farms area where the three IDF soldiers were grabbed.

Timor Goksel, spokesperson for the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, told Ha'aretz Sunday that the special investigation team "is to be kept separate from the UNIFIL forces. We aren't connected to them, and they are doing their work independently."

Responding to recent reports in the Lebanon Daily Star newspaper contending that UNIFIL received orders to destroy evidence related to the Hezbollah kidnapping, including pictures and cellular telephones used by the kidnappers, Goksel said: "Everything said to be destroyed in the reports is in our hands, and so these are very peculiar news items."

Meantime, Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri continues to suggest that his government's efforts to improve the country's social and economic infrastructure are being undermined by Hezbollah's attacks against Israel.

Interviewed by the London-based Arabic language newspaper Al-Hayat, Hariri said that "anyone who contributes to the derailing of the government's policies and aims is acting against the interests of the state."

In a thinly veiled reference to Hezbollah, Hariri charged that critics of his government "fear, for partisan, political reasons, the state's success in the economic sphere."

Hariri added that his government's philosophy regarding the Middle East and peace differs from that of the Shi'ite Party of God. "At this stage," Hariri said, "we don't disagree with them about the Israeli issue. The basic difference is that we support peace, whereas they have their own view, holding that Israel doesn't want peace of any sort, and so the solution must be resistance and nothing else. That is their opinion and not our view. We believe that the resistance is important and necessary, but that in the end the solution will have to be a diplomatic one."

"Border tension is part of our life in the Middle East. Will this issue cause a real war? We do not believe so – I've said this a hundred times.

"War must not be allowed in the Middle East," Hariri added.

Holocaust denier could go bankrupt

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Holocaust denier David Irving is facing possible bankruptcy after being denied permission to appeal his defeat in a libel suit he brought against an American scholar.

The Court of Appeal in London rejected Irving's request to appeal last year's verdict by judge Charles Gray that labelled him a racist anti-Semite who had deliberately misrepresented and distorted historical evidence about the Holocaust.

Gray ruled that Deborah Lipstadt and her publisher, Penguin Books, did not libel Irving in her 1994 book, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory, in which she called Irving a Holocaust denier.

Last Friday, the three-judge appeals panel supported Gray's ruling and said Irving was "one of the most dangerous spokespersons for Holocaust denial."

"No objective, fair-minded historian would have serious cause to doubt that there were gas chambers at Auschwitz and that they were operated on a substantial scale to kill hundreds of thousands of Jews," the ruling said.

The court ordered Irving to pay a first instalment of $210,000 toward Lipstadt and Penguin's legal costs by Aug. 10. If he does not come up with the money, he faces bankruptcy.

Under the terms of Gray's original ruling, Irving must pay Lipstadt and Penguin's legal costs, which are estimated to be as high as $3.3 million (US).

Irving relied on donations from supporters to bring his legal challenge last month.

In his online diary, Irving says that it is "his own business" how he will meet his financial obligations and that he will never reveal the names of his supporters, "whatever the penalty."

Irving was not in court to hear the decision. His lawyer, Adrian Davies, said Irving was promoting a new book about Winston Churchill.

In an unusual move, the Court of Appeals allowed Davies to present three days of argument supporting his client's request for permission to appeal. These types of oral arguments rarely last more than an hour or two in Britain.

Lipstadt's lawyer, Richard Rampton, said that Irving was trying to turn the request for an appeal into an appeal itself.

"The court heard all the arguments to see if there was a glimmer of merit," Rampton told JTA.

"As it turned out, they didn't see a glimmer. In effect, they've heard the merits of the case, so I think that's the end of the line [for Irving]."

In theory, Irving could appeal to the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg, France, but Rampton said he doubts the international court would hear an Irving plea.

Irving has not asked for the House of Lords, Britain's highest legal authority, to hear his appeal.

"He hasn't exhausted all domestic remedies, so he is unlikely to be heard at Strasbourg," Rampton said.

Rampton said he did not know how far Lipstadt and Penguin were prepared to pursue Irving through the courts to recover their legal costs.

British Jewish leaders welcomed the ruling.

"The decision confirms beyond all doubt that David Irving is a falsifier of history and a Nazi sympathizer whose aim has been to sanitize Nazism and absolve Hitler," said Neville Nagler, director general of the Board of Deputies, an organization that represents most British Jews.

"His reputation as a historian has been completely destroyed," Nagler added.

'We get stronger every minute that passes'

By TAMAR BRACHA BESSIN

Guest Voice

Earlier this month, my very close friend's father was murdered. My friend's name is Chana. Her father's name was Ya'ir. He was a shepherd. Her mother makes pitas and cheese. There are nine kids in the family. Their last name is Har Sinai. They live in Susyah, a community half an hour south of Hebron, towards Beersheva. Actually, they live just outside Susyah.

Chana and I have become very good friends over the past year. I got to meet her whole family (other than her three older siblings, two of whom I had already met). Her house is amazing. It reminds you of Heidi's house: all made out of wood, so beautiful, like a dream. There's a small path that leads down the hill and a small swimming pool they built into a stone right nearby. They also have a cave right near it where they sleep sometimes. On top of the cave, her brother was building a mini-house for himself to live in. They also had the place where they kept the sheep.

When Chana gave me a tour and showed me her brother's mini-house, I was very surprised and asked if he was building it alone. She said he wasn't; he had hired local Arabs to help him, which is why he had to stop building now – because he was no longer relying on the Arabs. Her father used to hire Arabs, too, until the people from their community voted against it. At the surprised look on my face, she said that the Arabs were very friendly with her dad and with them. They had stopped hiring them just in case...

Then her father was murdered, perhaps by these same Arabs, the Arabs they thought were so friendly.

Whenever we went for a walk, Chana was barefoot. She almost always is, but since the stones were sharp and there was a lot of broken glass there, I was worried about her. Now she has no choice but to be without shoes because she's sitting shivah.

Recently I saw Chana on the bus, but when I saw she was only half smiling, I grew a little worried. She came up to me and told me that she was just at the dentist for some fillings and the left side of her mouth was numb. Who would have known she wasn't meant to really smile that day – that on that night, her father wouldn't return home the way the sheep did and his body would be found shot dead.

The next morning, my older sister Miriam and her friend, Na'ava, broke the news to me. I was in such shock that it took awhile for the information to register.

I soon started calling my friends, breaking the news to those who hadn't heard yet and making arrangements for getting to the funeral, which was scheduled for 3 p.m. We tried catching the 12:40 bus, but just missed it. So we took the 1:30 bus to Kiryat Arba, and from there we took a bus to Susyah. We got there at exactly three.

More than 2,000 people were there. On the way to the burial, I found Chana. Many of my friends were with her already. When she saw me, she came to me and started crying. We hugged, but I wouldn't let myself cry. Most of us didn't. We knew we had to be strong for her. We stayed with her throughout it all.

What you saw in Chana was a strength more powerful then you could ever imagine. When one of the girls in our class went up to her and told her to be strong, she replied, "We get stronger every minute that passes." The thing is, it was so true. You could see it in them.

At one point in the funeral, people started screaming, "Revenge!" Dalyah, Ya'ir's wife and Chana's mother, got up. She said she hadn't planned on speaking, but what she was hearing now called for it.

"I understand your anger," she said, "your want for revenge. But talking or screaming about it won't do anything. Ya'ir was a man of action and of little talking. The only way you could revenge is by coming and helping us. By coming and living out where we are. By making our roots there stronger and showing the Arabs that they didn't make us weaker, but stronger. That will be the real revenge."

Immediately, all the shouting stopped. The silence spoke louder than words.

At the end of the funeral, Chana told us she'd very much like it if we'd come back the next day to visit her. So four of us stayed in the dormitory back in Kiryat Arba. We took a bus there, and in the morning, caught a bus to Susyah again. We stayed with her for over three hours, until other girls came to switch with us and we had a bus back to Kiryat Arba. She was so strong. She greeted us with a hug and a smile. We talked, looked at pictures of her father, zichrono livrachah. We even laughed and joked with her. She smiled so much, even though at times she was sad. You could tell she'd make it.

When I got back to Efrat, I went right away to audition people for the play we're doing. That's how we live now. Going from a funeral to working on a musical. Life must go on. I'll be working on the play while I visit Chana. I don't come out sad from being with her. Quite the opposite. We all come out stronger. Imagine – she makes us stronger, when we're supposed to be giving her the strength!

Rabbis call for mass visits to Temple Mount

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Last week, the Rabbinical Council of Judea, Samaria and Gaza called on all Israeli rabbis to bring their communities to visit the Temple Mount and it urged the Israeli public to do the same.

This is the first time a group of rabbis representing a substantial segment of the religious Zionist public has ruled that it is permissible for Jews to ascend the Temple Mount, as long as certain areas are avoided.

Most leading Torah sages have ruled that Jews are not allowed on the mount at all, lest they accidentally tread on the sites to which they would have been forbidden entry when the Temple was standing.

The group of rabbis who met in Jerusalem last week plan to ask the Yesha Council of Jewish settlements to organize mass trips to the mount.

They concluded their meeting by "calling on all the rabbis of Israel to put their shoulders into saving the honour of the Temple Mount, which [has been] closed to Jews [since the outbreak of the intifadah], and to participate in demonstrations and marches that will take place on Tisha b'Av."

Rabbi Dov Lior of Kiryat Arba noted that the rabbis will have to prepare maps of the mount to show Jews where they may go and where, under religious law, they are forbidden to walk.

He urged rabbis who disagree with the council's new ruling to nevertheless show respect for it, arguing that public apathy toward the Temple Mount is one cause of the difficulties Israel is currently experiencing.

Rabbi Yitzhak Shilat of Ma'aleh Adumin added that since religious law does permit Jews to visit certain areas of the mount, "our right, obligation and ability to pray on the mount is many times greater than that of the Muslims, and we need to say this openly."

One of the key reasons for the turnabout in the rabbis' thinking, at least from the national religious rabbis' point of view, is the Wakf's ban, imposed on non-Muslims entering the area, right after then-opposition leader Ariel Sharon's visit to the site last fall.

Rabbi Daniel Shilo of Kedumim says that "the halachic argument that has prevented Jews from going to the mount cannot be decided by violence on the part of the Wakf and the Muslims."

Rabbi Shilo says that "there's a danger that the connection between the Jewish people and Temple Mount will be forgotten if we don't act."

Another reason for the change of heart is the persistent reports of changes being made to the mount by the Wakf. A team consisting of Public Security Minister Uzi Landau, Interior Minister Eli Suissa and Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert met recently and made a series of decisions concerning Israel's response to the construction activity on the mount.

But so far, the team is keeping the decisions secret, and Sharon, who named the team, has given instructions that nothing relating to the mount should be done without consulting him first.

Meanwhile, the grassroots committee to prevent the destruction of antiquities on the mount, which includes archeologists, continues to try persuade MKs and government officials that there is full-scale destruction of antiquities underway on the site.

Last week, they showed the prime ministerial team dozens of pictures taken from the air on July 4. In the pictures, a tractor-shovel is seen at work.

They also provided MKs with Arab newspaper accounts of Israeli Arab volunteers going every weekend to help clean out 37 cisterns found in the mount.

Archeologists say the cisterns are full of antiquities as well as dirt, and note that any cistern so discovered anywhere in the country should be surveyed by an archeological team before anything happens to what is found inside the ancient holes.

At the same time, a Foreign Ministry decision to reject a request by UNESCO to send an archeologist to inspect the activities on the mount came under sharp criticism from MK Collette Avital, a longtime diplomat, as well as from others, who noted that Israel had allowed UNESCO to send archeologists to monitor Israel's digging along the length of the Western Wall.

They didn't mind leaving their cars in parking lots at the entrance to the city and taking Egged buses to the stadium, which is located at the southern end of Jerusalem.

"These people are coming from all over, from Netanya to Nahariya," said Motti, a Jerusalem policeman directing traffic.

Security was tight in Jerusalem in preparation for the opening of the Games in the open-air stadium named for longtime former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek.

There were more than 1,000 security personnel guarding the stadium during the opening festivities. Until mid-June, the security threat posed by the ongoing Palestinian uprising caused Maccabiah officials to consider cancelling the event.

Australia's Maccabiah team gathered a day before the Games at the site of the bridge that collapsed during the 1997 Maccabiah Games, for an official memorial service for the four team members who died. There was a short memorial service at the opening to commemorate the Australian athletes, as well as the Israelis killed in the 1972 Munich Olympics and Jewish soldiers who died in World Wars I and II.

For the most part, though, spirits were high as athletes marched into the stadium in their uniforms.

"You have done it. Thank you," said Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. "This is the kind of solidarity we need, now, more than ever."

"We are one people, with one dream," Maccabiah World Union president Jean Feterer said. "Be strong and be courageous."

Why has Arafat abandoned his people?

- Why did he reject an independent Palestinian state in 100% of Gaza and 95% of the West Bank without even making a counteroffer?
- Why did he start a "war process" – by promoting violent hatred in his schools, summer camps, media and mosques – during the seven-year Oslo "peace process"?
- Why has he not used the PA's enormous assets in foreign banks to stimulate employment and alleviate his people's suffering?
- Why has he turned down every opportunity to teach peaceful co-existence to his people?
- Why has the US and the world community not held Arafat responsible for neglecting the basic needs of his people?

Is it possible that Arafat has abandoned his people because he prefers the legacy of "revolutionary warrior" to that of "accountable leader"?

Isn't it time we find a partner who wants to deliver peace to his people?

Democracies' criticism of Israel hypocritical

A very interesting item, "The death of a childish fairy tale," appeared in the Globe and Mail on July 14. Written by Margaret Wente, one of the paper's leading columnists, the subject was completely unrelated to the Middle East, but the article's perspective is nonetheless most instructive for those who care about how journalists treat democracies in relation to non-democratic regimes.

Wente's article dealt with the failure of Toronto's 2008 Olympic bid, and particularly on the idea that good, decent, democratic Toronto was the victim of a double standard by the "international media" (her term), which latched onto Mayor Mel Lastman's most regrettable remark about Africans, and on that basis treated Toronto to disproportionate and unfair criticism while ignoring Beijing's truly abysmal human rights record.

"The most peaceable and most multicultural city on earth was forced to defend itself from the taint of racism while one of its most repressive regimes was hailed as a responsible global citizen," Wente wrote. "But don't blame Mel for that. The international media are, on the whole, quite fond of left-wing dictatorships."

Sound familiar?

How often have we had to deal with the very same complaint about the media's treatment of democratic Israel versus the non-democratic Palestinian Authority and the surrounding Arab regimes? Allegations of human rights abuses in Israel will almost certainly attract vastly disproportionate criticism, while far graver breaches in the surrounding region are all too often passed over in silence.

True, democratic countries have set higher standards for themselves and so the expectations attached to fulfilling these standards are more exacting. This may not be fair but it is the reality. For this reason, the Canadian government holds Israel to a higher standard of conduct – and hence a higher measure of criticism – than it does the PA.

Israel's situation, however, raises Wente's complaint to another level: Israel is often held to an even higher standard of judgment than is applied to other democracies. For instance, the criticism from Canada, the United States, and Europe about Israel's "excessive use of force" in responding to violent attacks by the Palestinians, when Israel goes out of its way to minimize civilian casualties, is pure hypocrisy. Most of these democratic countries would react with far less restraint than Israel shows if they faced the terrible pressures and threats Israelis must contend with on a daily basis. With respect to dealing with mounting international criticism to Israel's policy of "targetting" terrorists, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres recently told British Prime Minister Tony Blair, "Britain never had to deal with Irish terrorists who decided to commit suicide."

In Wente's analysis, Toronto is a tolerant, multicultural beacon that risks falling some distance from what is expected. Israel, which declares itself a "light unto the nations," has even further to fall, its perilous circumstances notwithstanding. Fair? No. A fact of life? Unfortunately, yes. As even Toronto, in its own way, recently discovered.

Pro-Iraqi terror cell leader captured here

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Last week, the Shin Bet security service lifted a gag order imposed on the media regarding the arrest of an activist in a pro-Iraqi Palestinian organization that recently restarted operations in the territories.

Earlier in the month, a group of activists from the organization tried to detonate a car bomb at Ben-Gurion International Airport, but were foiled by security and intelligence services.

The arrested Palestinian is Mohammed Kandas, a resident of Sanjil village in the area of Ramallah. Kandas told interrogators he had been recruited into the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine in 1988 during a stay in Iraq.

In May this year he returned to Iraq for a brief visit and was entrusted with the task of maintaining ties between the organization's headquarters in Baghdad and its members in the West Bank.

• Capt. Shai Shalom Cohen, 22, from Pardes Hanna was killed and another soldier was wounded this morning in the Har Hebron area, when an explosive charge detonated beneath a jeep they were travelling in.

July 10

• Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat ordered armed militants to "pay no attention to what I say in the media, on television or in public appearances... Kill a settler every day... Kill settlers in every place," Ma'ariv reported. Arafat recently instructed his gunmen to increase the attacks on the settlers. "Woe to you if you let them [the settlers] reach their homes safely or travel safely on the roads," Arafat said.

July 11

• Police foiled a suicide-bombing attempt today in Afula when they apprehended a Palestinian terrorist carrying a bag packed with explosives and nails.

July 12

• Omri Sharon met with Arafat in Ramallah. The meeting took place after a serious increase in the level of Palestinian violence and stepped-up Israeli responses.

July 13

• Ha'aretz reported Syria recently test-fired a chemical warhead on a Scud B ballistic missile. The missile has a range of 300 kilometres.

July 16

• Two Israeli civilians were killed and approximately 10 people were wounded in a suicide bombing at the bus station across from the Binyamina train station.

July 17

• Security officials captured another Palestinian suspected of involvement in the lynching of two IDF reservists in Ramallah last October.

July 18

• President Moshe Katsav commuted the sentence of Margalit Har-Shefi, convicted of failing to report her friend Yigal Amir's plan to assassinate prime minister Yitzhak Rabin. She will be free on Aug. 10th after serving two-thirds of her jail sentence.

July 19

• Prime Minister Ariel Sharon condemned the drive-by shooting of three Palestinians, including a young child, in the West Bank, promising Israel will "do its utmost to apprehend those responsible for the attack."

July 20

• Israel rejected the call by the G8 industrial states for Israel to accept international monitors to monitor the "ceasefire" with the Palestinians. "Israel's position is a total rejection of international monitors," a senior official in the Prime Minister's Office said.

Actor has the audience squealing in The Full Monty

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Texas born classically trained actor Steven Skybell, 39, surprised his agents when he agreed to audition for the part of Harold Nichols in the touring production of The Full Monty, The Broadway Musical now playing at The Elgin Theatre, 189 Yonge St. in Toronto until Aug.5.

"This is a departure from the plays I usually do, but I'm happy to have this part," explains the Yale theater school graduate of his role in this production, about six unemployed steelworkers from Buffalo, N.Y. hoping to gain self-confidence and make a quick buck by stripping.

Loosely based on the hit British film, acclaimed playwright Terrence McNally adapted the stage musical to suit North American theatregoers.

"My character is a bit different than the other five guys, because he's not blue collar," Skybell says. "His fall from prosperity is a little higher. He's been brought to the level of the other five guys, which he finds uncomfortable at first. I like that he's obdurate – it's a really fun aspect of the character to try and develop this stiff-necked guy who ultimately learns to loosen up."

"The strip is not just people getting an eyeful at the end of the play, but about the audience wanting these characters to succeed," he says.

"They've set this little goal for themselves... which is to strip for one night only to make money, but by the end, the wives are all behind it and are urging their men to show it all. I love that the audience picks up on the vital bond between the husbands and wives," Skybell says.

"The first night we did the strip, the audiences response was so overwhelming because you are daring yourself beyond what the audience thinks you will do.

"With just a flick of one G-string, the audience as one unit let out this squeal. I think it rejuvenates you to go through that experience in live theatre."

Toronto is the first stop in a year-long tour that will take the mostly anonymous cast and veteran entertainer Kaye Ballard, who plays crusty but loveable piano accompanist Jeanette Burmeister, to Chicago, Washington, Boston and Los Angeles.

Skybell was raised in Lubbock, Tex. "There were only 100 Jewish families," he says.

"Lubbock had a very vital Reform Jewish community, but strangely enough, all my three siblings are Orthodox. They came back with a vengeance from a very reformed upbringing. It is harder for me to be Orthodox. When you are in the theatre you have to work on Saturday. I try to be as observant as I can."

At the age of 10, Skybell joined a children's theatre group. After high school he headed east to New Haven, Conn. to study theatre at Yale College and then continued on to Yale's drama school.

During his university years, he performed at the prestigious Williamstown Theatre Festival in Massachusetts in a Tennessee Williams' celebration attended by the playwright himself shortly before his death.

The last works Skybell performed before graduating in 1988 were Eugene O'Neill's Ah Wilderness and Long Day's Journey into Night. The latter play, which starred Colleen Dewhurst and Jason Robards, subsequently transferred to Broadway – a professional debut not usually afforded to many new graduates.

In 1997, Skybell was picked as one of two American actors to re-open Shakespeare's Globe Theatre in London, England, and gave a command performance for Queen Elizabeth that was later televised internationally on Great Performances.

"We performed a special tailor-made evening for the queen and met her afterwards," Skybell says. "It was a thrill. We were told she couldn't sit through a whole Shakespeare play, so we sort of presented highlights from several of the plays. The one time in the evening that she really rose to the occasion, was when a live horse was brought onstage."

NEVER STATIC: Harold Rosnick donated his kinetic abstract sculpture, Dancing to Images, to Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, where it is on display outdoors in the new atrium. Using fine steel rods and 11 round mirrors that move with the wind, Rosnick, 75, says this is a new innovation and a unique piece. "Many people [in Baycrest] are confined to their bed or wheelchairs, and that is why I wanted to create a sculpture that is constantly in motion." Rosnick, who says he has sold his work to various places in Canada, Israel, Mexico and the United States, has been sculpting for 25-30 years. [Erin Silver photo]

By JOYCE SINGER-D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — At twenty-three most film directors would be described as up-and-coming, but in this instance it's fair to say that award-winner Naomi Hiltz has arrived.

Shortly after graduating from York University, she presold her first feature film Jack's House to TMN – the Movie Network. It is currently featured in various film festivals and scheduled for a wide release this fall.

Jack's House is garnering comparisons to the infamous Blair Witch Project, also an Indie film, which was completed in about 3 weeks. Hiltz topped that with her scriptless film, which was filmed entirely in one day, with three full run-throughs. The original concept called for only a handful of performers. But the audition process was so overwhelmingly successful, that she ended up hiring close to 30 actors.

The star, Christian McKenna, and the rest of the cast were given the premise of the story, and only their own character's personal history. After that, it became an improvisational experience that took on a life of its own.

McKenna's character is a writer hell-bent on finishing his Hollywood script by the end of the weekend. He keeps getting disturbed throughout the weekend, by friends and foes alike, constantly dropping in unannounced.

In April, Hiltz won the 'Ground-Breaking Director' Award, at the New York International Independent Film Festival.

"In my fourth year at York, for whatever reason, they didn't want me to do a film called Natural Magic. It's a short documentary on the controversy between psychics and magicians, which I felt it would be really entertaining. So I decided to make it anyway and it got a good mark. They show it from time to time on the Space Network. I guess, to make a long story short, it's the first notoriety I got as a director."

Naomi, her brother Jonathan, 25, and their business partner Myles Shane, 26, have started their own comany, Hiltz Squared Media Group.

"It all started when my brother had this great idea to make a commercial about drunk driving. He wrote it and acted in it. I directed it. And the CBC ended up playing it for a while."

With offices in Toronto, and one opening soon in L.A., their combined ventures include The Levi's Toronto International Teen Movie Festival; MNJ records; M.A.S. Media, a book publishing and distribution company; Hiltz Squared Entertainment, film & TV distribution; and Hiltz Squared Productions, their film & TV production company.

Naomi and her brother aren't exactly babes in the woods when it comes to the entertainment industry. Their father, Marty Hiltz, is a professional musician. Her mother died in 1986.

"She had something like a cyst on her brain, a tumour, which was not detected until too late. It happened really quickly. But my father did a really good job raising us!"

In 1999 Naomi joined a group going to Israel for an archeological dig. Visiting the Wailing Wall, she finally came to grips with the loss of her mother, who had also been there when she was about Naomi's age. "I really felt her presence there. It was a very spiritual thing.

"The only thing that made me happy when she passed away, were those two hours when I'd be sitting in a movie theatre… To be able to entertain anyone for two hours, and make them forget about their problems, is the greatest achievement."

Film revolves around prim Jewish girl from Russian shtetl

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Man Who Cried is an earnest film about upheaval, identity and yearning set in Russia, England, France and the United States. It is played out in English and, to a modest degree, in Yiddish as well.

Featuring a stellar cast and written and directed by Sally Potter, it revolves around a prim and proper Jewish girl from a shtetl whose life takes unexpected turns.

Now playing at the Cineplex Odeon chain, The Man Who Cried is a traditional family saga, but is thankfully bereft of the usual pathos of its genre.

Never succumbing to gimmickery, Potter has produced a movie that is both realistic and relatively alluring. But by keeping its emotions in tight check, she loses some of the spontaneity that otherwise might have elevated it to a higher plane.

The film opens in 1927 in a remote Russian village. Several Jews sit around a table, discussing in Yiddish the advantages of settling in America. The village cantor has already decided to leave. His plan is to find work and send for his mother and daughter, Fegele. But a spasm of violence engulfs the burg, and Fegele is bundled off to Britain.

For reasons never explained, Fegele, renamed Suzie, is placed with a Christian foster family. They send her to a girls' school where she is forbidden to speak Yiddish and forced to repress her Jewish background.

"You're going to learn to fit in," a well-meaning teacher says with a tight smile.

Fast forwarding 10 years, The Man Who Cried shifts to Paris, where Suzie (Christina Ricci) becomes a chorus girl and befriends Lola (Cate Blanchett), a cynical, manipulative and somewhat racist Russian dancer.

The pair subsequently find jobs in an opera company. Lola, eager to achieve upward mobility with a minimum of fuss, makes the acquaintance of its leading singer, an arrogant, self-absorbed Italian anti-Semitic dandy named Dante (John Turturro).

KIM CAMPBELL NARRATES MUSICAL NOAH'S ARK

Kim Campbell and composer and Broadway star Hershey Felder, premiere their musical Noah's Ark, in Toronto on July 30 and Hamilton on July 31.

Noah's Ark is a vivid retelling of the biblical story, incorporating details from the Kabbalah. Campbell narrates the tale as Felder conducts the National Academy Orchestra, founded by Boris Brott. Soloists are soprano Christianne Tisdale, tenor Glenn White and baritone James Barbour.

"We are delighted to be premiering this brilliant musical, composed by two distinguished Canadians," said Brott.

Last summer the Brott Music Festival welcomed Felder and Campbell to the stage for Glorious Gershwin, which was sold out in Toronto and Hamilton.

The upcoming performance also features selections from musicals by Bernstein, Kern, Gershwin, Rogers and Hammerstein.

Noah's Ark plays July 30 at the George Weston Recital Hall, Toronto Centre of the Arts, 5040 Yonge St. $17-$27, 416-870-8000, www.brottmusic.com. It plays July 31 at the duMaurier Centre, 190 King William St., Hamilton. $19-$22. 1-888-475-9377.

Water Music: The poems, stories and articles of Dr. George Bernstein of Windsor, Ont., have appeared in a variety of journals. He and Susana, his Venezuelan-born wife of 44 years, have three children and eight grandchildren who live in Toledo, Toronto and Ottawa.

Dr. Bernstein has also produced Water Music, a collection of poems, some on Jewish themes. It is published by Permission Press of Kamloops, B.C. A sample line from The Singer and The Song: "You are the gardener who in the winter of my life plants spring flowers in the playground of my soul."

Elvis Lives: An Elvis Presley concert, featuring a virtual Elvis on a huge video screen and peripheral screens of his back-up musicians combined with live accompaniment, has been touring internationally since its debut at New York's Radio City Music Hall in 1998.

Elvis - the Concert comes to the Hummingbird Centre for one night only. One Front St. E. $50-$65. August 14, 8 p.m. 416-872-2262.

Lovable Grampa Wanted: Loving Spoonfuls is seeking an energetic, lively and funny man over the age of 70 who knows his way around the kitchen, for an episode shooting in the southern Ontario area (within a 90-minute drive of Toronto) between Aug. 7 & 10. E-mail your nomination to michelle@lovingspoonfuls.com or visit the web page, [www.Lovingspoonfuls.com/PAGES/ suggestions.html]

Wagner Can Wait: Daniel Barenboim, the Israeli-born musical director of the Berlin Staatskapelle Orchestra, broke a long-standing taboo against playing the music of Richard Wagner in Israel earlier this month when he conducted an unscheduled performance of the Prelude to Wagner's Tristan und Isolde at a concert in Jerusalem.

Barenboim introduced the Wagner piece as an encore, preceding it with a discussion with the audience to gain their approval first. Although many listeners seemed amenable to the suggestion, some were deeply offended and left the concert hall after a heated debate.

Why the rush to pour Wagner into Jewish ears? More than half a century after the Holocaust, there are still many survivors in our midst who, along with their children and many others, would be understandably disturbed to hear this music performed in Israel.

Once, by the waters of Babylon, we wept at the thought of singing our songs in a foreign land. Now that we have returned to our homeland, why do we rush to import the songs of our enemies? Surely Wagner could have waited another generation or two.

E-mail worthy items to Eye on Arts at info@cjnews.com. Deadline is 10 a.m., Tuesday of the week before the issue.

Jewish Riga once again an exciting place to visit

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

RIGA, Latvia — "Where did you go during the war?" I ask Lia Gherman, as she is closing up Riga's Jewish museum, on the top floor of the 1914 Riga Jewish theatre on Skolas Street.

"To Russia. We had no choice," she said.

About one-quarter of Riga's Jewish citizens survived to return, as Gherman did, to resume life in what some say is the most beautiful city in the Baltics.

Even fewer did what she and a handful of others have accomplished.

For just over a year, their Museum and Documentation Centre has enjoyed official museum status, although it is entirely dependent on private donations.

After the long, dark night of the last half of the 20th century, Jewish Riga has once again become an exciting place to visit.

A hundred years ago, Riga was home to a thriving community of 30,000 Jews and the city celebrated its 700th anniversary. The emergence of modern Latvia – independence would come in 1920 – and its wealth of Art Nouveau buildings, was inspired by this landmark celebration.

Sir Isaiah Berlin, philosopher and historian, once lived in an apartment a few streets away from the Jewish theatre, in a building whose entrance is flanked by a pair of stone sphinxes. Latvian Jews participated in the prosperity and emerging Latvian nationalism, as many spoke both Latvian and Yiddish.

This year, as Riga celebrates its 800th birthday, Gherman tells me the Jewish population, which was virtually wiped out after the war, numbers around 12,000. Riga boasts the first Jewish day school in a former Soviet satellite country.

During the Soviet occupation – when there was no "Jewish life," as Gherman says – the theatre was used as an art school. Twelve years ago it was returned to the community.

One such rescuer is a dockworker named Zanis Lipke who dug a trench in his cellar and hid and saved 53 Jews as well as his own family.

Generally the number of rescuers are small and the occupations of the saviours are humble.

If discovered, the helpers and the hidden were often tortured and executed.

The lives of Jews in Latvia are celebrated inside the top-floor museum. Latvian Judaism blossomed between the 18th and 20th centuries, although a trickle of Jews had arrived as early as 1561. Timber merchants, physicians, artists, musicians, athletes and architects are portrayed here, as are many photos of the Jewish secular schools and the sports clubs that flourished in Riga.

The city was known as a centre of Zionism. The first chief rabbi of Palestine, Abraham Isaac Kook (1865-1935), was from Latvia. Though he was not Jewish, Janis Rainis, Latvia's most famous poet, is pictured in a photo on holiday in Palestine with his phsyician, Dr. Livshitz, and his wife.

That an era of compatibility existed is undeniable. That it ended horrifically is equally true. This is the simple, direct message of the Jewish museum, spotlighted by a few remnants saved from destruction and a whole wall of books written about what happened here. The Jewish People Survived is the theme of the final exhibit.

One of the worst atrocities was the 1941 burning of the Great Choral synagogue located near the train station. Inside were hundreds of fleeing refugees and Rigan Jews. Today the Synagogue, or what remains of it, has become a place of commemoration and remembrance for Jews and non-Jews alike.

On a memorial stone with a Star of David at the entrance, visitors have placed flowers to honour the dead. In Riga's new Occupation Museum, which also tells of the Holocaust, visitors will find more flowers left in remembrance. Since Russia's departure in 1991, memorials to Jewish communities dot the Latvian countryside.

One temple survived the Nazi period, the 1905 synagogue on Peitavas Street in Old Riga. Gustavs Shaurums, a Christian Reform pastor, is given credit for saving it. After the war, in the boarded up eastern wall, the beautiful Torah cabinet and Torah scrolls were discovered.

Today one can visit Riga's only synagogue, which has been refurbished, if not completely restored. It projects a mood of cheerful religious observance in keeping with the present optimism in Riga.

Family saga remains a fairly solid cinematic accomplishment

This part of the story moves smoothly. The scenes in which grizzled old Gypsy musicians play their sinuous and infectious music are particularly compelling and a tantalizing window into Gypsy culture.

With Germany's occupation of France, the lives of the protagonists change irretrievably.

Dante, a fascist who claims that Jews murdered Christ and form an international banking conspiracy, ingratiates himself to the Germans. Lola, ever ambitious, accepts his collaboration without a murmur.

While they cavort with the Germans and the Nazis round up Jews and Gypsies, Suzie camps out with Cesar and his Gypsy friends.

Although The Man Who Cried falters a little toward the denouement, it remains a fairly solid cinematic accomplishment. The script is lean, the direction is sensitive, the cinematography is artful and the performances, especially by Turturro, Ricci and Blanchett, are quite adept.

In other words, The Man Who Cried leaves a viewer quite satisfied.

Couple donates funds for genetic disorders research

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Naomi and David Freudmann have been spearheading activities to establish The Ehlers-Danlos Syndrome and Connective Tissues Disorders Chair at The Hospital for Sick Children (HSC).

"Our daughter Tamar suffers from Ehlers-Danlos Syndrome. She was first diagnosed 20 years ago by Dr. Robert Jackson, an orthopedic surgeon, after frequently dislocating her knees, hips and shoulders," said David Freudmann.

To recognize the efforts of the Freudmanns, the fund's name was recently changed by the hospital to The Freudmann Family Ehlers-Danlos and Connective Tissues Disorders Research Endowment Fund in the hopes that it will lead to the establishment of a research chair.

"We have already raised, in 16 months, about $175,000 and we have pledges for another $40,000," said Freudmann. "Our aim is to create the research chair, but we cannot do so until we have raised $2 million."

Ehlers-Danlos Syndrome and Connective Tissue Disorders (EDS) is an important group of genetic conditions that reduce the strength of the connective tissues of the skin, ligaments, tendons, eyes, heart and blood vessels.

EDS affects both males and females of all ages, races and ethnic backgrounds.

Fragile skin and unstable joints that characterize EDS are due to faulty collagen, a protein that acts like glue in the body, adding strength and elasticity to connective tissue.

There are six major types of EDS and they are classified according to the signs and symptoms manifested.

Diagnosis is based on clinical findings and on the family history. A diagnosis is often delayed or overlooked because patients do not fit neatly into one of the specific types of EDS – bruising, skin wounds and joints that dislocate.

Medical practitioners are only now becoming more aware of the illness.

Prognosis and treatment of EDS depends on the specific type. Life expectancy can be shortened with the vascular type of EDS due to the possibility of organ and vessel rupture. Life expectancy is normal in most other types of EDS.

For more information on EDS or the Freudmann Family Ehlers-Danlos Research Fund, call David Freudmann, 416-493-3322, or Rosemary Nault at the HSC Foundation, 416-813-5608.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. What is the difference between foods labelled sugar free, unsweetened and no added sugar?

A. The big difference is that a food labelled sugar free contains no sugar at all – like diet pop, cheese, diet desserts, etc. A food labelled unsweetened or no added sugar usually means that no additional sugar has been added but that natural sugar is likely present. This would likely include products like applesauce, juice and light jams. It is important to realize that the amount of natural sugar in these foods can be quite substantial and add both calories and sugar.

Q. Are fat-free foods really a healthy choice?

A. Many fat-free foods are of course a fabulous choice. However, you want to watch out for a lot of fat-free snack foods that add sugar and starch in place of fat. Also many people eat twice as much of the fat-free snack food because it is less filling. Many fat-free cookies or snack bars have twice the number of calories of the popular full-fat varieties, and while the fat is less, you may be no further ahead on your diet by choosing these.

275 PERSONAL COMPANION

Widow in Oak Park, Michigan looking for a man between the ages of 43-52. I am slightly physically challenged, would accept somebody who is also slightly physically challenged. I would consider someone with children for a possible steady relationship. Respond to CJN Box #7364.

Attractive, active lady going to South America in Nov. with "Senior Tours" would like a non-smoking male/female partner to share room. 416-787-9737.

Is there a warm, affectionate lady 70+ out there, who like me is looking for the excitement of companionship. I am an 86 yr. old gent in a retirement home, but I love to go out. I am waiting for your call. Call Irv between 9-11:30 am. 416-223-9972.

A pasionate, brilliant and engaging woman ..... with an uncompromising passion for life, best describes this 39 yr. old (SJF) who can wield a pen in the boardroom and a paddle on the rivers of Peru with the best of them. She seeks an accomplished man (35-45) that will share her tireless sense of embracing life and who is unafraid of leading her (or being led) around all of its literary, culinary, artistic, animal loving and humourous blind curves. Do you feel comfortable in jeans or a tux? If so call me Lorelei at 617-492-1200, or write to Gentlepeople, 172 Newbury St., Boston, MA, 02116. All our clients are interested in long-lasting relationships. A Gentlepeople Personal Search. Our client has paid all fees.

Torah scroll donated

TORONTO — A Hachnasat Sefer Torah ceremony was held recently at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care to celebrate the scroll donated to the centre by the family and friends of the late Oscar Shainhouse.

Shainhouse's wife Florence and their four daughters – Syrelle Bernstein, Marlene Brudner, Mary Carrel and Pam Shapiro – had consulted with Cantor Paul Kowarski of Beth Tzedek synagogue beforehand about their idea to donate the precious scroll.

"My father's Yiddishkeit and Jewish upbringing were very important to him," said Bernstein, who is the director of volunteer services at Baycrest.

"We have a long history with Baycrest and knew that a Torah would be used every day.

"We purposely picked a scroll that would be light enough for residents to hold. It was a very moving ceremony and we're really thrilled that the Torah scroll is a living memorial to my dad," she said.

At the ceremony, Kowarski chanted as four of Shainhouse's grandchildren each held a corner of their late grandfather's tallit. Louis Shainhouse, Oscar's brother, held the Torah.

Thornhill student Teen Dancer of the Year at American Dance Awards

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ashley Fenster, 15, is as excited to win a dance competition now as she was when she was eight years old.

This summer, Ashley, who also performs jazz, tap, ballet lyrical and pointella (a more specialized form of ballet), is off to Orlando, Fla., to compete there.

For several summers she has competed in the CNE's Rising Star Talent Show, and last summer she was one of four finalists among about 300 dancers up to 21 years old. "Dancers have to audition to get in, but as a finalist last year, I do not have to audition for this year's show," Ashley says.

Ashley started dancing at age seven – she has been with the All That Dance school since she was nine – and did competitive gymnastics from ages five to seven.

"When she was only two, her gymnastics coaches told me she had special talent," says her mother Robyn. "She wanted to dance, however, and she has never looked back."

She started with jazz and acro, and won her first award – she received the second highest mark of everyone who competed – at age eight in a competition in Niagara Falls, N.Y.

"It was exciting, but this last award was just as exciting. I love being on stage and I love performing," says Ashley, who dances 24 hours a week and takes vocal lessons.

It is hard to describe Ashley when she is on stage, says Robyn. "Backstage she is very nervous, but once she is performing, she draws in the audience. When she is through, she knows if she has done well, but she also knows exactly what she has to work on.

"She understands that it is not easy to succeed, and she devotes all her time and energy to her dancing and singing. I really think she has a chance to make it [professionally]."

At school, Ashley, who maintains an 85 percent average, is part of the high-performance athletes program, which is designed for students who spend at least 15 hours a week in an extra-curricular sport.

As part of the program she has to complete sports-related assignments – one of her assignments was about how women are treated in sports – and keep a journal and log sheets.

Fitting everything into her schedule, Ashley says, "is just a matter of time management. I don't have a lot of free time. Basically, I dance and get my school work done."

Robyn and her husband Alan, a lawyer, have a son and three other daughters; another daughter, Shelby, also dances competitively.

"Getting them to their competitions is a major commitment. I am their chauffeur and cheering section," says Robyn.

First baseman Lou Limmer shone as Toronto Maple Leaf

By ALEX BEDER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A recent article on the CJN's Sports page paid homage to some of the great Jewish baseball players of past and present but omitted one individual who played two years of Major League ball, had a tremendous minor league career and has a special connection with Toronto.

Lou Limmer played first base for the Philadelphia Athletics in 1951 and 1954. In 209 games, he hit .202, including 19 home runs, his first coming in Yankee Stadium. Limmer caught the eye of Jack Kent Cooke, the late mogul from Hamilton, Ont., who owned the Toronto Maple Leafs baseball team.

After the Maple Leafs' regular first baseman was injured, Cooke signed Limmer as a replacement. In his season with Toronto, Limmer performed spectacularly well at first base and at the plate, hitting 33 home runs. Fans voted him Most Popular Player on the team.

Limmer was also a favourite with the local press. As the Globe and Mail noted in a feature story, Limmer had a heroic service record during wartime. He had served in the U.S. Air Force as an under-aged fighter pilot, enlisting at 17, following in the tradition of five brothers and a sister who had also joined up.

"He served in some of the rougher days of the United States strategic bomber command in England, bailing out or crash landing five times," the Globe noted.

Despite Limmer's outstanding war record and batting average, Cooke was in a quandary as to what to do with him once the player Limmer had replaced returned from the sidelines. For some reason Cooke preferred to keep the other player around, so he traded Limmer to Charleston. This was like banishment to Siberia, and many fans were enraged.

I knew Cooke because my box seats were next to his, and we occasionally socialized at the Oakdale Golf and Country Club.

After Cooke announced he was sending Limmer to Charleston, I was so disgusted that I took my tickets, threw them at Cooke's face and told him in no uncertain terms what he could do with his team. I never went back to another Toronto Maple Leafs baseball game.

Meanwhile, a group of fans, myself included, decided to show our appreciation of Limmer's outstanding contribution to Toronto baseball. We publicly presented him with a $500 Canada Savings Bond between games in a double-header. That was a huge chunk of money in those days.

That was close to 50 years ago, and Limmer and I have kept up a friendship ever since. He lives in New Jersey and winters in Florida. Hardly a week goes by that we don't speak to each other. He introduced me to some of the biggest legends in baseball: guys like Hank Bauer, Sandi Koufax and Hank Greenberg. I went to his kids' bar mitzvahs in New York and he came up to Toronto in 1991 especially to attend my 85th birthday party.

Lou Limmer: what a ball-player! what a friend!

Youth basketball teams off to quick start

TORONTO — Canada's squash, 10-pin bowling, gymnastics, track and other athletes have captured medals in early competition at the 16th Maccabiah Games in Israel.

According to Maccabi Canada spokespersons, Canada has won two silver medals in women's squash and two bronze medals in 10-pin bowling. The official Maccabiah Web site (www.maccabiah.org) reports that two Canadians have won silver and bronze medals in track and field.

Canada's junior basketball teams are also proving to be medal contenders, while the men's open (adult) team has been finding the early going a little more difficult.

The Canadian girls opened the hoops tourney with a 44-20 romp over the host Israelis and followed that up with a 63-8 pasting of Great Britain. In other hard court action, the boys handed Britain an 81-33 shellacking in game one and then hammered Turkey 74-30 in their next match.

Meanwhile, the men's open team, which captured a gold medal in 1997, had yet to make it to the win column. They opened with a tight 76-67 loss to France and then were beaten 68-57 by Australia.

In track and field, Diana Mannerow won a bronze medal in the 200-metre sprint, finishing behind Russian and Israeli runners. In the 1,500-metre event, Gretchen DuMoulin won silver, and she finished third in the 3,000-metre run, behind two Israelis.

In volleyball, Canada opened with a 3-1 loss to Brazil before defeating Turkey and losing to Mexico.

In beach volleyball, Canada's men's team lost three games by identical 2-0 scores – to Israel once and twice to the United States.

The junior boys soccer team defeated South Africa 2-1 after losing to Israel 12-0, while in water polo, Canada's men lost to Israel's A team 10-5 and to the United States 4-3.

The CJN will carry more results in upcoming issues.

ספרותנו

About Food

I'm always on the lookout for easy suppertime solutions, especially in the summertime, so I was delighted to discover Vegetables Every Day by Jack Bishop (HarperCollins, $44.95).

Dear Norene

This comprehensive A to Z guide to vegetables includes selection tips and preparation instructions for more than 66 commonly available vegetables. You'll find 350 delicious, uncomplicated recipes for salads, side dishes, soups and main courses. Most recipes are suitable for the kosher kitchen or can be adapted easily.

Try this terrific potato salad, which matches perfectly with grilled summer foods. Each slice of the grilled crusty eggplant is creamy and soft inside. Vegetables are the key to healthful eating, and Bishop's book will help you discover how great they can taste, each and every day!

ROASTED POTATO SALAD WITH MUSTARD-BALSAMIC VINAIGRETTE

2 lbs. red potatoes, scrubbed and cut into 1-in. chunks
6 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
1 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
2 tsp. red wine vinegar
2 tsp. Dijon mustard
salt, to taste
1/4 cup snipped fresh chives

Preheat oven to 425. Place potatoes on a large rimmed baking sheet. Drizzle 1 1/2 tbsp. of oil over potatoes and toss with your hands to coat them evenly. Roast potatoes, turning once, until golden brown, about 45 minutes.

Meanwhile, whisk vinegars, mustard and salt to taste in a small bowl. Whisk in remaining 4 1/2 tbsp. oil until smooth. Adjust seasonings.

Transfer roasted potatoes to a large bowl. Re-whisk dressing and drizzle it over potatoes. Sprinkle with chives and mix well. Adjust seasonings and serve warm or at room temperature. Makes 6 servings.

GRILLED EGGPLANT WITH GARLIC, LEMON AND OREGANO

1/2 cup lemon juice
1/4 cup extra-virgin olive oil
4 medium garlic cloves, minced
1 tbsp. minced fresh oregano leaves salt and freshly ground black pepper
4 medium eggplant (2 lbs. total)

Whisk lemon juice, oil, garlic, oregano and a generous sprinkling of salt and pepper together in a small bowl.

Cut eggplant into 3/4-in. thick rounds. Place in a large zipper-lock bag, add marinade and seal the bag. Turn bag several times to coat eggplant with marinade. Set aside, turning bag occasionally, for 1 hour.

Light the grill. Grill eggplant over a medium-hot fire, turning once, until dark and crusty, about 10 minutes. Transfer to a large platter. Serve hot or at room temperature. Makes 4 side-dish servings.

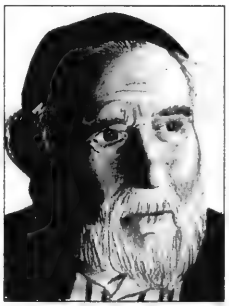
Paul Soles discusses the role of Shylock

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter



Soles as drawn by Michael Nisimov

TORONTO — When Paul Soles was approached to perform Shylock in Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice, he felt an enormous sense of responsibility – as an actor, a Jew and a Canadian.

Being the first Canadian Jew to play Shylock at Stratford, it was important, Soles said in an interview, to bring as much integrity to the role as possible.

With his background in theatre, film and television, Soles, 70, believes he has the maturity needed for the part and is hoping that with his presentation, the audience will leave Stratford with an appreciation of some of the nuances intended by the playwright.

"The play is useful if we understand that no one really behaved well. Shylock was dealt with as unfairly as he intended to deal with Antonio, one of the Venetian merchants. There is dishonour on both sides," Soles said.

"Human beings may have had reasons for their unjustifiable behaviour. So be it. Such is the human condition."

Soles' interpretation of Shylock was not well received by all patrons. In a recent letter to the Kitchener Waterloo Record, one writer complained that "Shylock, the Jew, intended as the antagonist and enemy, was turned into the protagonist and hero."

The writer of the letter laments that "where Shakespeare would have us laughing and

Grassroots missions planned for Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A small group of community activists, who operate under the name Israel Solidarity International (ISI), is promoting new missions to Israel they hope will attract thousands of travellers to the Jewish state.

Although details have not entirely been finalized, the concept is modelled on the Israel Birthright program (which is aimed at young people) and involves offering drastically discounted trips underwritten by donations from pro-Israel philanthropists.

The activists say that by making the trips more affordable, thousands of Jews who could not otherwise travel might be enticed to overcome security fears, show solidarity with Israel and pump much needed currency into the local economy.

Already $1 million has been pledged to the project and the first flight is scheduled to depart for Ben Gurion Airport on Aug. 20. Participants will be asked to pay only about $600 of the actual cost of the mission, which will include stays in five-star hotels, touring, ground transportation and educational programs. The tickets will be good for 45 days and participants will have the option of extending their stay at their own expense.

George Friedmann, a member of ISI, which was formerly known as Israel Now!, said the idea is to provide participants with such an attractively priced package that "intuitively it shows there is an important reason to go."

The "fear factor" can be removed somewhat if the cost of travelling is reduced, said Izzy Kaplan, another member of the committee. Travel to Israel has gone down drastically since the

CANADA

Police Called

VANCOUVER — The RCMP had to be called to calm the audience at a recent public forum hosted by Jews for a Just Peace. Tempers flared during a question-and-answer session between the 100 or so audience members and panellists, who included Palestinian representatives. The Western Jewish Bulletin reports that after the presentations were made, insults were hurled, some in the crowd became verbally hostile, and police were called. There were no reports of arrests.

New President

OTTAWA — The Jewish Community Council of Ottawa has a new president. Gerald Levitz took over from Stephen Greenberg at the council's recent 67th annual general meeting.

ISRAEL

Bodyguard Arrested

JERUSALEM — Israel has arrested one of Yasser Arafat's bodyguards, who has admitted carrying out terror attacks against Israelis. Enis Mahmoud Namoura holds the rank of second lieutenant in Arafat's special protection unit. He told interrogators he learned to make bombs in Algeria, where he was sent by the Palestinian Authority in 1995, Army Radio reported.

Recruitment Centres

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Force is planning to call up tens of thousands of reservists abroad in the event Mideast tensions escalate into war. Recruitment branches have opened in Los Angeles, New York, London, Paris, Amsterdam, Frankfurt, Johannesburg, Bombay and Bangkok.

Conductor Rapped

JERUSALEM — A Knesset committee has called for conductor Daniel Barenboim to be declared persona non grata in Israel until he apologizes for conducting a piece by Richard Wagner at the Israel Festival last month. Prior to the concert, Barenboim agreed to remove Wagner from the program after a public outcry over performing works by the anti-Semitic composer. But he later changed his mind and conducted a Wagner selection as an encore.

Funds Stolen

JERUSALEM — The deputy director general for finance of the Weizmann Institute has admitted to stealing $5 million from the Friends of the Weizmann Institute Foundation. Israel Radio reported that the official lost the money in gambling and failed stock investments.

Fries'n'Web

TEL AVIV — Diners at a suburban Tel Aviv branch of McDonald's can now order the World Wide Web with their burgers and fries. The outlet in Ra'anana is believed to be the first McDonald's to install computer terminals at the tables and offer customers Internet access for a fee.

WORLD

Shul Flap

MOSCOW — A conflict has erupted here over the use of one of the city's five synagogues. The Russian Jewish Congress, which built the synagogue in 1998 as part of a Holocaust memorial, insists the shul be used as a Holocaust education facility, but a group of observant Jews is demanding access to the synagogue for prayer.

Blast Marked

BUENOS AIRES — Some 5,000 people gathered July 18 here to mark the seventh anniversary of the bombing of a Jewish community centre. Jewish leaders denounced Argentine officials, who have not yet found those responsible for the AMIA bombing, which killed 86 people and wounded about 300.

Citizenship Revoked

WASHINGTON — A U.S. court has stripped a one-time Nazi guard of his citizenship. A judge found Mykola Wasylyk lied to immigration officials about his service at two slave labour camps in Poland. More recently, Wasylyk, 77, owned rental bungalows in New York's Catskill mountains. Wasylyk is the 65th suspected former Nazi to have lost his U.S. citizenship since 1979.

Appeal to Venezuela

CARACAS — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre has asked the president of Venezuela to back efforts to find 18 suspected Nazi war criminals who fled to the country after World War II. The appeal to Hugo Chavez came as a Wiesenthal Centre official charged that Venezuela never followed through on its promise to co-operate with an effort to track down former Nazis.

Gay Film Wins

Solzhenitsyn's Book Causes Stir

MOSCOW — Nobel Prize winner Alexander Solzhenitsyn is being accused of distorting the history of Russian Jewry in his new book on Russian-Jewish relations.

In the introduction to 200 Years Together, a 500-page treatise, the famed novelist says he is "appealing to both sides, Russian and Jewish, to come to patient understanding and to acknowledge their own share of blame."

But the controversial author's position on the czarist-era pogroms is at odds with most historians.

Solzhenitsyn, 83, blames the pogroms on a grassroots movement, exculpating the Russian state from any responsibility in the anti-Jewish attacks.

He also blames the "liberal intelligentsia" – often a code word for Jews – for exaggerating the extent of pogroms.

"Solzhenitsyn's book is anti-Semitic and mendacious. It is deliberately distorting the history of Russian Jews," said Victor Dashevsky, a Jewish historian who heads the Moscow Anti-Fascist Centre.

Solzhenitsyn's book covers Russian-Jewish relations from the late 18th century, when the partition of Poland placed large numbers of Jews in the Russian Empire, until the Russian Revolution of 1917. He intends to continue his exploration in a second volume.

Mideast peace conference slated for Halifax

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO—Efforts by a Canadian MP to bridge differences between Palestinians and Israelis have resulted in a planned three-day conference where politicians from both sides of the Mideast conflict will meet in Canada to talk peace.

The Halifax Peace Forum, scheduled to take place in the city Oct. 14-16, will bring six legislators from the Knesset and six from the Palestinian Authority to discuss how the two sides can end the violence and what role Canada can play.

The brainchild of Nova Scotia Conservative MP Bill Casey, the Tories' foreign affairs critic, the conference "is a very modest proposal. It's not going to resolve the Middle East crisis. We have no illusions about that," Casey told The CJN.

"But we want to open lines of communication and establish a dialogue. While we're learning from them, we hope they will learn from each other."

Casey said organizers have commitments from six Palestinian legislators. The makeup of the Israeli delegation hasn't been firmed up yet, but he's hoping it will reflect a broad range of views.

'An all-party steering committee has been struck'

An agenda has not been drawn up yet. Casey said an all-party steering committee has been struck, and experts in conflict resolution will contribute.

The conference will be on the parliamentary level, meaning no ministers and party leaders will attend, Casey explained.

One thing is certain: The role Canada can play in the Mideast conflict will be high on the agenda.

"Canada is in a unique position. We have an image as helpful and even-handed, and have earned the trust of both sides," Casey said.

The impetus for the conference came earlier this year when Amir Maimon, counsellor at the Israeli embassy in Ottawa, and Baker Abdel Munem, the Palestinian representative in Canada, separately addressed the Progressive Conservative caucus.

"What struck me," Casey recalled, "is that they both said the same thing." Also, both "challenged us to do something."

Casey picked up the gauntlet and wrote to foreign affairs minister John Manley, who gave a conference in Canada his blessing but pledged no funds.

Casey then called Air Canada, which agreed to donate some round-trip air fares. Private fund-raising in the Jewish and Palestinian communities is hoped to cover other costs.

Casey said Nova Scotia's Jewish Lt.-Gov. Myra Freeman, agreed to host a reception at Government House in Halifax. Fifty volunteers at Saint Mary's University, where the conference will take place, said they would help. Even the operator of a tall ship has offered the vessel to take conference participants on a ride around Halifax harbour.

"It was the easiest thing I ever did. We got a lot of immediate support," Casey said.

He then accompanied Manley on the minister's trip to the Middle East this past spring. Casey met with Palestinian president Yasser Arafat and Israeli foreign minister Shimon Peres. Both leaders were immediately onside.

Encouragement has also come from Egypt and Jordan.

"We hope to play a small part in promoting peace," Casey said. "If we open lines of communication, we will have achieved a lot."

The Merchant of Venice

From the editor's desk

At times during the production of The Merchant of Venice currently playing at Stratford, I actually squirmed in my seat, barely able to sit still, agitated, discomfited, angered by the dialogue and the plot of the play that literary critics and scholars document as one of Shakespeare's two most popular. (The other is Hamlet.)

The play contains four subplots: Shylock's determination to collect his "pound of flesh" from Antonio; the game sequence involving the three caskets that conferred the right to marry the desirable Portia; the love affair between Lorenzo and Jessica, Shylock's daughter; and the fluffy, gender-driven, one-upmanship regarding the wedding rings.

But beyond a doubt, it is the drama involving Shylock that dominates the play and accounts for its astounding, I would add, lurid, popularity these past 400 years.

Shylock, who first appears in the third scene, appears only in five scenes altogether. Yet his personage, his demeanour, his behaviour, dominate the play. All else is but transitional, emotional relief for the gripping gravitas of the harrowing struggle by the chivalrous Christians against "the villain Jew."

There is no denying the play is a difficult one for a Jewish audience. (It should also be difficult for an informed, non-Jewish audience. One hopes it is.) Shakespeare is a brilliant playwright, deft in layering a story, developing characters, and remarkably resourceful in joining words and phrases into precise, poignant conveyances of thought.

Within five minutes of the opening curtain, the ghoulish centrepiece of the fourfold plot – Shylock's malicious obsession – is foreshadowed by one of the play's minor characters, Gratiano, in attempting to comfort his inexplicably forlorn friend, Antonio, the merchant of the play's title. "Why should a man, whose blood is warm within,/ Sit like his grandsire cut in alabaster?" (My emphasis.)

Antonio's "warm" blood, of course, is the deciding factor that ultimately brings about Shylock's downfall.

Shakespeare knew his audience, which explains why he could entertain them so well. More to the point, however, he was part of his audience. His plays reflected the times in which he and his audience lived, their attitudes, prejudices, stereotypes and mythologies.

One of the chief prejudices of his times – alas, a prejudice handed down with love and reverence in Europe from one generation to the other like a precious family heirloom – was the hatred of Jews and ignorance of Judaism.

The intent of Shakespeare's Shylock subplot and the Lorenzo-Jessica subplot – to reaffirm the central, controlling stereotype of the Jews and the triumph of Christianity over Judaism – is apparent with every exchange of his characters' dialogue. The words in these two subplots must be read and heard and understood in the context of this intention.

Merely a few examples will prove the point.

In the taut, gut-wrenching trial scene (Act IV, Scene I), the last in which Shylock appears, the Duke sets the tone of the imminent legal proceeding when he characterizes the Jewish plaintiff as "A stony adversary, an inhuman wretch/ Uncapable of pity, void and empty/ From any dram of mercy."

True to his catechisms, Shakespeare ensures in the audience's mind that Mercy is the embodiment of the defendant's religion, Christianity. And he relies upon his biblical knowledge when he writes Justice as the embodiment of the Jewish religion.

Justice, the Jewish God, is the egregious, aggressive plaintiff in the trial. "I stand for judgement," Shylock unambiguously asserts. Mercy, or Christianity, itself is the defendant.

And so the trial begins.

"We all expect a gentle answer, Jew," the Duke importunes Shylock. The pun between gentle and gentile is not accidental.

"Can no [Christian] prayers pierce thee [the Jew]?" an anguished Gratiano rails in the distressing prelude to the trial's disquieting climax.

In the mouth of Portia, the bard makes plain his purpose: "[Mercy] is an attribute to God himself/ And earthly power doth then show likest God's/ When mercy seasons justice. [My interpretation: When Christianity seasons Judaism]/ Therefore, Jew… in the course of justice none of us/ Should see salvation." (My emphasis and interpretation: In the course of Judaism, there is no salvation.)

Director Richard Monette and his troupe are to be commended for the production. Though I squirmed in my seat, I sat there a captive to the company's skill.

Lucy Peacock as Portia was especially powerful. Her presence shone on stage. She single-handedly commanded the trial scene in Act IV.

Paul Soles delivered a compelling Shylock. Emotionally constrained and understated, he conveyed a great deal in the deliberateness of his carriage and in his nuanced movements. The slight stoop in his gait conveyed more than Shakespeare intended. For in the perceptible ache of his bowed shoulders, he was able to convey the cruel, debilitating weight of Europe's history toward the "villain Jew" and the awful, abject humiliation as human being, father and Jew: Shylock's final indignity.

Commission on Vatican 'may have run its course'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Canadian member of an international historians' commission studying Vatican policy before and during the Holocaust fears it may have run its course.

"I'm not so optimistic we'll be reassembled," said Michael Marrus in an interview. "We've taken this as far as we can go."

Marrus, Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Professor of Holocaust Studies at the University of Toronto, was referring to last week's decision by the panel to suspend its probe of Vatican archival material.

The suspension was prompted by the Vatican's refusal to grant the historians unfettered access to unpublished documents relating to Vatican activities prior to and during World War II.

The panel was jointly established in 1999 by the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews and the International Jewish Committee on Interreligious Consultations.

The historians, three Jews and three Roman Catholics, agreed to review 11 volumes of already-published Vatican records from World War II and to pose questions about "unresolved matters" concerning that documentation.

In a preliminary report last October, they said the documents they had studied raised 47 "significant questions" about the actions of Pope Pius XII and the Vatican during this period. They requested access to unpublished documents relating to the war.

After the report was released, Marrus said he would await a Vatican reply to their request. As he then put it, "The ball is in the Vatican's court."

On June 21, Walter Cardinal Kasper, president of the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews, issued a formal response.

Informing them that an examination of Vatican archives after 1923 was impossible due to "technical reasons," he asked the historianss to prepare a final report.

Kasper also referred the historians to Rev. Peter Gumpel. He is charged with the task of promoting the beatification of Pope Pius XII, who has been accused of being largely indifferent to Nazi Germany's persecution of Jews.

Dissatisfied with the thrust of Kasper's letter, the historians sent him the following note on July 20:

"Without some positive response to our respectful case for material in the archives that has not been published, we could not maintain our credibility with the many voices, Catholic, Jewish and others, who have called for greater availability of archival material.

"We therefore cannot see a way forward at present to the final report that you request, and believe that we must suspend our work."

In a personal statement dated July 23, Marrus noted: "We have still much to learn from this terrible moment in contemporary history. It is vitally important that this effort to understand continue in a climate of free inquiry, open debate and mutual respect."

In a tone suffused with disappointment, he added: "Unfortunately, those in charge of the Vatican's archives seem unprepared at present to take the essential steps toward full disclosure and unfettered research."

Marrus expressed skepticism about Kasper's explanation that "technical reasons" forbid the historians to go further than 1923.

"Where there's a will, there's a way," he observed.

Marrus said he was not encouraged by a comment about the matter from Eugene Fisher, associate director of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Fisher essentially said that the Vatican archives would eventually be opened.

"This doesn't give me much comfort," mused Marrus, dean of graduate studies at the University of Toronto and author of The Holocaust in History and Vichy France and the Jews.

Asked what may happen next, Marrus said, "It's impossible for me to say where we go from here."

Michael Marrus

Pressed to elaborate, he suggested that the commission's suspension of deliberations until further notice may well harden into permanence unless Kasper changes his view on archival access.

Describing Kasper's stance as "something of a setback" to Jewish-Catholic relations, which he said have improved remarkably under the current reign of Pope John Paul II, he urged the Vatican to come to terms with its role during the Holocaust.

He said that further research does not necessarily mean the Vatican will be incriminated by damaging information, or a "smoking gun."

Speaking for himself, Marrus said he seeks a "deeper, fuller and richer" understanding of Vatican policy during the 1930s and 1940s.

He disclosed that the historians on the panel basically concur on substantive issues, minor disagreements notwithstanding.

"We're a lot closer than one might think. There is a lot of support for our position in the Roman Catholic world. But the church is a traditional, slow-moving institution. It'll take time to make progress."

Admitting he does not know what Pope John Paul II's position on the archives is, Marrus said he and his fellow historians have yet to meet with him and discuss it.

"You might draw the conclusion that he should have made time for us. He chose not to intervene. Our panel is not up there, in terms of priority, with stem cell research."

SAWW helps empower South African women

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — South African Women for Women, an organization dedicated to the empowerment of South African women in South Africa and Canada, is holding its sixth annual awards dinner on August 11.

Carole Adriaans, founder and president of SAWW, said the organization holds the dinner in order to honour the accomplishments of outstanding South African women.

"We are an organization of diverse women who, working together, can provide mutual support and forums for networking. Together, we will nurture the spirit of our unity," said Adriaans.

She said that the award recipients are "role models for all of us. We salute them and their achievements. In honouring these exceptional women, SAWW is also making a contribution to the betterment of women in South Africa."

Among its other activities, SAWW has a teacher mentoring program in which Ontario-based teachers spend three weeks in disadvantaged schools sharing information and teaching strategies, provides scholarships for financially disadvantaged South African women and runs a health program.

Janice Dembo, a patron of the organization and a 1997 Race Relations Award recipient says SAWW is made up of "women who could not have socialized with each other in South Africa because of apartheid laws.

"This organization has become a sisterhood, something that never could have happened in South Africa when they lived there. It epitomizes working together, and most of the women left South Africa before that was possible."

Women of different racial groups did not mix, Dembo, who has been an advocate for human rights and against racism since she came to Canada in 1972, said. "One did not interact on an individual level; there was no intimacy."

This year's award recipients include Helen Suzman, who receives the Courageous Leadership Award. A member of Parliament for 36 years, Suzman, who still lives in South Africa, became the country's best known woman politician. She has won world recognition for her "staunch and ceaseless opposition to the policy of apartheid," said a SAWW press release.

CJC offers sensitivity training program to OPP

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Ontario region has offered its newly written sensitivity program to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP).

Len Rudner, director of community relations at CJC Ontario region said that the CJC offered the bias and sensitivity program, Understanding our Differences, to the OPP because "we thought we could provide a window of reality into the community they are serving."

Congress has always "been in the business" of speaking to police recruits and candidates in order to make them aware of the issues of diversity, he said. "That is a tradition that is well rooted."

This is the first time, however, that a training program has been put down on paper, he said. "Having it written ensures consistency and it gives us the ability to make an impact."

Rudner said that the impetus for actually writing the program came about after he and Bernie Farber, executive director of the CJC Ontario region, had a meeting with York Region chief of police Robert Middaugh.

They are members of the police chief's multicultural group that meets monthly in order to help Middaugh keep a perspective on community policing.

"I was given the responsibility of developing a draft, and I put together an ad hoc committee derived from members of CJC Ontario's community relation's committee. They worked on the program throughout the winter and it is now freshly minted and approved."

The program was offered to the OPP, he said, after news accounts spoke of uniformed and civilian officers trading autopsy pictures and making inappropriate and insensitive remarks about certain ethnic groups, said Rudner.

"This was all happening internally, but I guess the remarks must have crossed someone's screen who did not approve. Once something like this gets out, the media get hold of it," he said.

"It is of tremendous importance that police officers have no preconceived notions, and it is important for the OPP to know that it is a matter the Jewish community and the community as a whole takes seriously," said Rudner.

Frank Bialystok, chair of the community relations committee, said that it is vitally important that the OPP move quickly to restore public confidence in the professionalism of its uniform and civilian staff.

"Canadian Jewish Congress and the OPP have worked well together in the past. We are pleased to be able to offer our assistance in the spirit of that ongoing relationship."

Fax campaign promotes anti-Semitic stereotypes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Detectives of the Toronto Police Service's hate crimes unit are investigating a series of anti-Semitic fax transmissions sent to Toronto-area recipients last week.

The faxes vary in length from one to three pages, with the first page repeating classic anti-Semitic Jewish conspiracy propaganda. Written in broken English, the document claims that Jews control governments around the world; that globalization "is for the Jewish profit;" that Pope John Paul II was born of a Polish Jewish woman; that Jews control the United Nations and the European parliament; that Jews in Toronto get the best jobs; and that anybody telling the truth about Jews ends up killed or kidnapped.

The second transmitted page advertises an anti-racist rally held last week to call on Mayor Mel Lastman to resign, while the third page lists a number of allegedly Jewish individuals in positions of power. Many of those named are not even Jewish.

"I think the person sending this out is a wing nut of the first or second degree," said Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress. "This kind of stuff gets cobbled together out of a person's fevered imagination."

Rudner said he has forwarded the faxes to Toronto police, along with a suspect's name.

Several targeted individuals had done a *61 search after receiving the transmission, and independently had turned up the same phone number. An Internet search of the number revealed the suspect's name, Rudner said.

Congress believes the fax campaign is a form of harassment and likely violates Canada's anti-hate laws and the Canadian Human Rights Act.

Rudner said he knew of about a dozen individuals who received the faxes, but it was unclear how they made it onto the suspect's list.

One recipient, a Holocaust survivor who wishes to remain anonymous, said the documents reminded him of Poland during World War II. At the time, leaflets were circulated that claimed Jews were crawling with lice and that warned Poles to beware of Jews.

"I felt the same way; here we go again," he said. "I felt terrible, very frustrated. No matter where you go, you're still a dirty Jew."

Canadian Volunteers for Israel president retires

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Esther Shilling believes that if you go to Israel once, you'll be "hooked forever."

At least, that was her experience, she explained in a recent interview. Shilling, who retired earlier this year after eight years as president of Canadian Volunteers for Israel (Sar-El Canada), can still be found on a regular basis at the organization's tiny volunteer-staffed office. She has worked there since 1988, during which time more than 1,000 Canadians have participated in the program.

Esther Shilling

A 70-year-old mother of four and grandmother of three, Shilling displays a youthful enthusiasm when she talks about her volunteer work. Sar-El is "a wonderful experience," she said. "It's totally different from being a tourist. It's just great. I love it. I think it's a super program."

The longest-serving president of Canadian Volunteers for Israel, Shilling – who was succeeded as president by Len Berk – is anxious to tout the program. "It's so important for people to be aware," she said. "It's an opportunity to give something to the country."

Volunteers work on an IDF supply or maintenance base and wear army fatigues while on duty. Their tasks may include kitchen work, gardening, sorting hardware, or packing food, clothing or equipment, freeing up Israeli reservists who would otherwise be assigned to the mundane tasks.

The three-week program includes kosher meals, a day tour, evening activities and optional home hospitality with an Israeli family over Shabbat.

Trips are normally scheduled twice a year, in October and April, although volunteers can arrange to go individually virtually any week of the year.

This summer, a special solidarity mission is also scheduled, with room for 20 volunteers. The mission, which leaves Toronto Aug. 11, will feature subsidized air fare. Participants can choose to stay for either two or three weeks.

Shilling believes that, in light of the intifadah that began last fall, an army base is "the safest place to be."

Although there have been fewer volunteers since the onset of the intifadah (65 for the year 2000, compared to a more typical 75), Shilling prefers to think that volunteers are postponing rather than cancelling trips.

She first took part in Sar-El (the Hebrew acronym for Sherut L'Yisrael, or Service to Israel) in 1987, a year after the Canadian branch of the international organization was established. She packed dried rice, tea and coffee at the largest army base and lived in a barrack with other women. In 1992, she and her husband Sam volunteered together. They were last in Israel three years ago.

Shilling's volunteer career dates back to her days as a young mother pushing a stroller while canvassing for United Jewish Appeal after a neighbour got her involved. She also taught millinery at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and English to Russian immigrants at National Council for Jewish Women, of which she is still an active member. The latter position eventually became paid employment, lasting 13 years until her mandatory retirement.

She still remembers the "beautiful spring day" in 1948 when her mother called her in from outside to tell her the State of Israel had been born. As her mother's relatives in Europe had all perished in the Holocaust, the significance of the occasion was not lost on the teenager.

Yet Shilling's reaction on her first trip to Israel in 1974, when she was moved to tears just to be there and to be met at the airport by her husband's Israeli relatives, caught her off-guard. "And I've had this feeling ever since."

Masters manipulating symbols and opinions

Last Sunday, Tisha b'Av, a well-organized cadre of Muslim youth from the precincts of the Al Aksa mosque on the Temple Mount, threw rocks, bricks and bottles onto the heads of the Jews worshipping below at the Western Wall. Acting as any responsible police force would anywhere else on earth, Israeli police intervened to protect the worshippers, stop the rock-throwing and arrest the perpetrators. Of course, mayhem ensued. Dozens were injured, including at least 19 policemen. Thankfully, no one was killed.

But the images that were broadcast around the world, once again, especially into the satellite-enabled televisions in the Arab Middle East, were of Israeli (read: Jewish) riot control police (military) presence on the Temple Mount (holy Islamic territory) confronting Palestinian youngsters (self-defending Muslim worshippers).

To the visual images of the confrontation was added the media-reported "justification" for the stone-throwing by the Palestinians onto the Jews below: the Palestinians were merely reacting to the planned incursion by the Jews to lay a cornerstone for the rebuilding of the Jewish Temple on holy Islamic territory. But this justification was no justification at all. Much like the famous walk by Ariel Sharon on the Temple Mount on Sept. 28, it was a pretext, a well-planned and smartly executed operation by the Palestinian leadership to manipulate highly-charged symbols and influence ill-informed or malignly-inclined opinion against Israel.

The Temple Mount Faithful is a well-known, small, fringe group within Israel. They speak for no one; have been appointed by no one and represent no one. For the last few years on Tisha b'Av, they have declared their intention to re-establish a Jewish presence on the Temple Mount. But the Israeli government has never let them disturb the peace, let alone the status quo of the Temple Mount. The Palestinian authorities knew this. This year was no different. Israel did not permit the 30 or so "Faithful" to go anywhere near the Temple Mount with their cornerstone. Instead, the group held a "ceremony" far away from the Western Wall plaza, and thus too, far away from the Temple Mount.

That "ceremony" lasted some five minutes and concluded by 9 a.m, after which the group dispersed, their effort to re-establish a Jewish presence on the compound over. Fully three hours later, the rocks, bricks and bottles began to fly. The Palestinian youths had begun their "defence" of the mosque, incited to do so by the false, fanatic exhortations of Wakf clerics and two Palestinian members of the Knesset.

After calm had been restored, the Palestinian Authority was pleased. The images had been broadcast; the "news" had been reported. They even falsely attributed the restoration of calm to the intervention of foreign, namely, U.S. and European, observers.

Pope could have denounced Assad

French politicians should be applauded for labelling Syrian President Bashar Assad as an anti-Semite for his statement last month, in the presence of the Pope, that the Jews betrayed Jesus Christ and tried to betray and kill the prophet Mohammed. Perhaps, out of diplomatic courtesy, the Pope did not respond in Syria, but surely upon his return to the Vatican, he could have denounced Assad as the French politicians did.

Richler's experience with the CJC

In his column of July 12 ("Memories of Mordecai"), Ron Csillag recalls the furor that erupted following Richler's publication in 1992 of Oh Canada! Oh Quebec!, his indictment of the xenophobic and anti-Semitic strains in Quebecois nationalism. Richler was particularly outraged at the egregious response from officials of the Canadian Jewish Congress, who seemed to bend over backwards to placate and appease these same nationalists.

CJN readers with long memories may recall that an almost identical incident occurred a decade earlier, albeit on a smaller scale.

A colleague and I had published an article in the Jerusalem Post in January 1982, in which we described the unease felt by the Montreal Jewish community in the face of the French-only language and sign laws that had been passed by the Levesque government. We were denounced and pilloried by Quebecois nationalists, in particular those at Le Devoir.

At that time, too, the CJC leadership was asked to condemn us, and to their shame they did so, claiming that we were marginal to the Jewish community. Both of us had lived almost all of our lives in Montreal up to that point and were in fact quite active in teaching and writing about Jewish affairs.

"Revisiting" Turkey's Jews

In connection with Gary Rusak's July 5 article, "Turkey's Jews: A rich legacy," I would like to make the following clarifications and corrections:

The author states that Jewish marriages were outlawed in Turkey. I was married in the Neve Shalom Synagogue in Istanbul. What misled the author to his conclusion was that in 1926, Turkey enacted a secular civil code. The concept of monogamous marriages became the law and only civil marriages were held to be legal. This did not preclude one from having a Jewish marriage in a synagogue, but to do this, the couple had to go through a civil marriage first. The aim of this legislation was to prevent Islamic men from having more than one wife. However, the couples were free, after the civil marriage, to have a religious marriage.

The author also mentions that the teaching of Hebrew in schools was outlawed. This is not correct. In Turkey, the primary education had to be in Turkish, but, again, this did not preclude private schools from teaching Hebrew. In fact, my wife, who attended the Galata Hususi Musevi Karma Okulu, also had Hebrew courses every day for five years.

When Hitler expelled Jewish professors from Germany, it was Turkey that granted them refuge. These professors were given full academic title, and interpreters were provided to enable them to teach in various universities. By way of example, I mention two of my professors: Prof. Hirsch and Prof. Andreas B. Schwartz at the Istanbul law faculty.

Notwithstanding the above, I would like to thank Rusak for a very informative article.

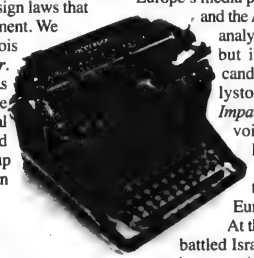
Israel sends mixed messages

Your coverage of Israel Asper's spech mentoring the Canadian government ("Asper slams Canada's Mideast policy," CJN, June 28) could not have come at a more opportune time. When most of North America's and Europe's media portray the Jewish State as the bully and the Arabs as its victims, Asper's incisive analysis not only sets the record straight, but it also set a standard of fearless candour for Canadian Jews. Frank Bialystok's remarkable book, Delayed Impact, enables one to compare Asper's voice with that of Canada's Jewish leadership during World War II, vainly imploring the government of the day to save the hounded Jews of Europe.



At the risk of appearing disloyal to embattled Israel, let me put Asper's example to use by mentoring Israel's government. Can Israel's prime minister take firm steps against terrorism when his foreign minister treats the master terrorist as a last best hope of peace? Given such mixed messages, is it really surprising that Canadian foreign policy favours the party with consistent underdog messages? Even a strong voice like Asper's will not be audible to our government unless Israel's government provides the needed acoustics.

'The Jewish people have an obligation to survive, and must not despair': Emil L. Fackenheim

By TAMAR HAUSMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Emil L. Fackenheim, the renowned post-Holocaust Jewish thinker, has spent his life since his escape from Nazi Germany trying to determine what should be the logical Jewish response – political, theological, and philosophical – to the Nazi's "radical evil," his phrase for Nazi terror.

The most significant response by the Jews was the creation of the State of Israel, says Fackenheim, who left Germany for England, moved to Canada, and then made aliyah in the early 1970s. Perhaps his most meaningful contribution, enthusiasts say, is that he elucidated the religious significance of the Jewish State through the concept of the "614th commandment," his idea that the Jewish people are obligated to survive, and are forbidden to despair in the face of evil.

A degree of controversy has surrounded that concept: his critics have questioned whether it is possible and right, from a philosophical standpoint, to rethink and redefine Judaism in light of the Holocaust, its worst tragedy, and Hitler, its worst enemy.

Regardless, Fackenheim's ideas, expressed in nine books and hundreds of articles on the Jewish relationship to God, the Jewish response to the Holocaust, and other topics, have generated volumes of thought and debate about Judaism. These ideas remain relevant even now, not only because "Israel is in crisis today," he says, but because they relate to the future of the Jewish people, not merely to the immediate aftermath of the Holocaust.

Earlier this summer, on his 85th birthday, Fackenheim was honoured in Jerusalem. About two dozen scholars of Jewish thought and Holocaust studies gathered for a two-day conference to discuss Jewish philosophy after the Holocaust and his contribution to the subject.

Several of the speakers were former students of Fackenheim, who retired at age 80 as a professor at Hebrew University's Institute of Contemporary Jewish Studies, and who was previously a professor of Jewish studies at the University of Toronto.

"Emil is a philosopher who has something to say about theology," says his good friend Yehuda Bauer, professor emeritus of Jewish studies at Hebrew University and academic advisor to Yad Vashem.

At the core of Fackenheim's beliefs is that the Holocaust should not be interpreted as evidence that God does not exist. If that were the case, it would mean that the Nazis did in fact defeat the Jewish people – even the survivors – by destroying its faith in God, the key element that has tied the Jewish people together for millennia. But he also believes that there are no theological answers about whether or not God exists, and he cannot explain God's silence during the Holocaust. Nevertheless, he insists that there be a Jewish response.

A short step away from that reasoning is his concept of the 614th commandment, which demands that the Jewish people seek to survive and not "hand Hitler posthumous victories." That phrase has been interpreted to mean preventing assimilation,while it also underpins the significance of the State of Israel.

"The foundation of the State was a tremendous achievement," he says. "And the best thing Israel did was to enact the Law of Return."

But while he sees the establishment of Israel as the great and necessary response to the Holocaust, Fackenheim does not say that all Jews must live there.

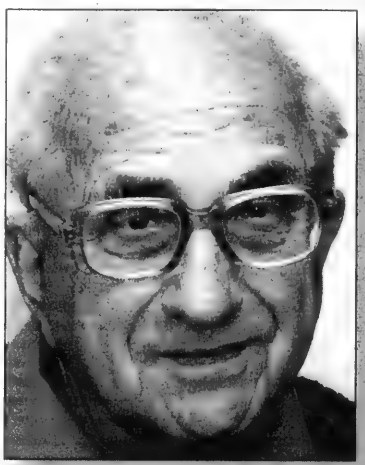
Instead, he believes that "the Holocaust was the centerpiece of the modern Jewish world and that it created a mandate to value Jewish life – that an attempt must be made to recover Judaism," says Michael Morgan, a professor of philosophy and Jewish studies at Indiana University, Bloomington. Morgan has edited several anthologies of Fackenheim's essays, and was his research assistant for many years when Fackenheim taught at the University of Toronto.

Concerned that the Holocaust and its lessons will be forgotten in 100 years, Fackenheim says that the challenge for the Jewish people now is to perpetuate the memory of the specific character of Nazi terror – which, he says, was more radically evil than other tragedies in Jewish history.

Meanwhile, Morgan says, Fackenheim believes that "Jews should continue to open themselves up to Judaism, try to live a Jewish life, and find a relationship with God, in the hope that there is a God, despite the uncertainty that there is one. He is positive but realistic about the post-Holocaust world."

Understanding Fackenheim isn't easy: he moves from midrash to social commentary, to Nazi horrors, to Israel, to commentary from other philosophers. He spent 10 years writing a book about the religious dimension to the thought of philosopher Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel. His most popular book, What is Judaism?, is about Jews' relationship to God.

To Mend the World, his magnum opus, was published in 1982. It discusses the philosophers who have influenced his thought – and expresses deep dissatisfaction with Western philosophy in the 20th century, because it did not prepare the world for the Holocaust and did not provide the apparatus for understanding it afterward.



Emil L. Fackenheim

"The greatest Jewish philosophers didn't know what to do with radical evil," Fackenheim says.

Fackenheim himself, however, was driven to understand Nazism.

"There is a common misconception that Fackenheim only began to confront the Holocaust in philosophic terms in 1966 and 1967 – and until then had been enclosed in a theoretical, abstract world of German idealism and Hegel," Morgan says. "But in fact, Nazism was the motive for him to move to Berlin to study about Judaism. He was always moved by a sense of urgency to learn about Judaism, and he was always driven by existential issues, even if he didn't show it until 1966."

Morgan says that he believes Fackenheim began to confront the Holocaust in 1966 and 1967 because only then could he begin "to cope with it intellectually and personally." Fackenheim had studied Hegel for many years, but he eventually determined that "Hegel himself wouldn't have been able to handle the Holocaust. It was outside his system," Morgan says. "Emil realized that philosophy needed to be constantly open to new events," and thus he began to grapple with the evil of Nazism.

Though Fackenheim was influenced by several other German philosophers, Jewish and non-Jewish, as well as some political heroes and other Holocaust historians and writers, including Primo Levi and Elie Wiesel, his biggest influence was the philosopher Martin Buber. A great proponent of Jewish existentialism, Buber believed that each person can enter into a personal dialogue with God. But Buber was never able to reconcile his idea about dialogue with God with the Nazi experience.

Fackenheim wasn't satisfied with stopping at Hegel and Buber's perceived or real limits when it came to the Holocaust. His mentor in Germany, Leo Baeck, also provided support for his ideas. Baeck survived Terezienstadt, but "he never told anyone what he experienced and what he knew about the Nazi atrocities because he wanted liberal Judaism to live on. He didn't want Jews to despair," Fackenheim says.

The 614th commandment, which embodies this idea, is especially relevant now because of the Palestinian intifadah. It should be at the forefront of Jews' minds today – and beyond, he says.

"If America and the British stood firmly together – as they failed to do early enough during the Holocaust – and said to Arafat, 'You don't get a penny from me unless you arrest the terrorists,' then this crisis wouldn't be as deep as it is now, and the Jewish people wouldn't be under siege," he says. "Jews should be united in their persistence to have a state that can support itself and bring olim [immigrants]."

Ironically, Fackenheim has never had much of an audience in Israel; his fans have been mainly overseas. A source who requested anonymity says he believes that "a main reason for his marginal status in Israel concerns political issues. The academic establishment tends to be very leftist, and Emil has been viewed, with some justification of course, as rightist. Also, Israel is a small country, with little enough room at the top of the ladder of academic influence, even philosophical and theological influence.

Emil came to Israel relatively late, and even many people who knew him for years were less than hospitable."

At least part of the reason for that may be that Fackenheim never learned Hebrew well, and he always taught his classes at Hebrew University's Rothberg International School for Overseas Students in English.

Two years ago, Fackenheim decided to put away his philosophy books and begin studying history, particularly Jewish history in the 20th century. The reason? He has already given his interpretations and provided suggestions for the Jewish response. Now he wants to know how the historians who are interpreting the Holocaust, and thus, how the world, and the Jewish people specifically, will understand it in the distant future.

"Now I'm finding out about who said what happened, because when people ask why it happened, there is no answer," he says.

Concerned that the Holocaust and its lessons will be forgotten in 100 years

Lord Sieff remembered

During the last six months, news about Israel was usually dripping with descriptions of continuing violence, and rare were the occasions when other news of Israel reached the public. I am therefore glad to receive publications of the various academic institutions that flourish in Israel, always reading them avidly. They are a side of Israel's life that is rarely exhibited.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Thus, even when the death of a significant figure is announced, the obituary will likely reveal not only the nature of an outstanding personality but also a special aspect of continuing love for the Jewish State.

An example was the death of Lord Marcus Joseph Sieff of Brimpton, whose life story was detailed in the latest issue of Interface, the spring/summer issue of the Weizmann Institute of Science. Amongst other interesting information, it contained a full biography of Lord Sieff whom I had known in days past.

A bit younger than I, he achieved prominence not only as one of the principal founders and supporters of the institute, but also for his pervasive love of Israel.

His mother, Rebecca, was a founder of the Women's International Zionist Organization, and his father, the first Lord Sieff, was a close friend of Chaim Weizmann. Marcus followed in his father's footsteps and, by his support of the Weizmann Institute, became one of the most influential Jews of the Diaspora. He had visited Palestine in 1929, fell in love with it and became a lifelong advocate and supporter.

Among the many tributes to Lord Sieff that Interface published was one by Murray B. Koffler, Canada's leading supporter of the institute.

He writes: "His contribution to the institute is legendary. What must be added to his legacy, however, is the contribution he made to the Canadian Society. It was Marcus and Myer Weisgal, to whom I was introduced in London in 1966, who encouraged and inspired me to undertake the challenge of forming a Canadian committee for the institute. Lord Sieff never missed an opportunity to participate in our activities. His annual visits and repeated attendance at our meetings and functions in Toronto and Montreal made an enormous impact on our membership and resulted in icreased support for scientific research. As friends, Marvelle [Murray's wife] and I treasure our memories of Marcus and Lily, who enhanced our lives as they did all others with whom they came in contact."

To which I say a hearty "Amen."

An angry voice from within

The current, number-one, Israeli non-fiction bestseller has caused significant debate and controversy across religious-secular lines. In her radical book, Cosmic Fear: The Rise of the Religious Right in Israel, Tsvia Greenfield attacks the religious community for its attitude and policies towards Israel as a Zionist, Jewish and democratic State.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

This isn't just another anti-religious polemic by a member of the Israeli secular left. Far from it. Greenfield herself is Orthodox and a member of the haredi community. For the last several years, spurred by the shock of the Rabin assassination, she has been a vocal critic of her community's political ideology and practice, while espousing classical liberal principles of democracy, pluralism and individual rights.

An educator, philosopher and mother of five, Greenfield heads the Mifne Institute, dedicated to the development of educational materials for peace, tolerance, liberal thought and democracy. After the assassination, she was among the founders of Religious Women for the Sanctity of Life, an organization dedicated to peace and the sanctity of life as a supreme value in Judaism. Since the publication of her book eight weeks ago, Greenfield has been the recipient of hate mail and even death threats for her outspoken, iconoclastic views.

Greenfield describes her purpose in writing the book as threefold: first, to express her profound disappointment in the religious-Zionist and haredi communities. Both of these, she believes, have failed to provide a relevant, modern, Jewish vision for Israel in the 20th and 21st centuries. The religious-Zionist community's single-minded focus on the territories and the cause of a greater Israel, and the haredi community's effort to undermine the democratic institutions of the State have been equally negative forces in the life of the country and its community.

Greenfield's second objective is to restate a modern Zionist agenda. To her, this entails a just, humane, democratic society that is committed to the defence of the Jewish people, and that is firmly rooted in its Jewish heritage and sources.

Her third objective is to advocate the search for peace rather than conflict as a sine qua non for future stability of the State. Greenfield started writing the book well before the outbreak of the current intifadah, and the most vocal opposition to it has come from those who object to her defence of the search for peace.

Greenfield's most scathing and original criticism comes in the parallel she draws between the post-Zionists on the far left and those whom she describes as "post-Zionists" on the right. In her view, the religious right has been seriously challenged by the nature of the Jewish-democratic State. The success of the secular, Zionist endeavour created an existential crisis for those who believed in an absolutist truth based on religious faith and practice as the only means for Jewish survival. This, in turn, led to their need to undermine the secular community's success and to define a new, national agenda. For the Zionist-religious community, this resulted in an identification of settlements and territories captured in 1967 with the very essence of the state and its future.

For Greenfield, this is as negative as the extreme left's interest in making Israel less Zionist and a "state for all it citizens." This argument is bound to be the most controversial in the book. The mere use of the term "post-Zionist" to describe those who view themselves as the last true Zionists, namely the religious-Zionist community and the settlers, is bound to spark a vigorous public debate.

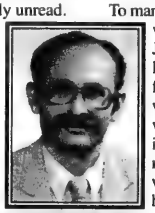
Greenfield describes herself as "confusing" to many who cannot reconcile her blatant criticism of the religious community and her ideological Zionism with her personal, haredi lifestyle. At the very least, in a society that facilely labels individuals in neat ideological categories, she defies definition and forces her readers to rethink stereotypes and prejudices.

Despite the darkness and pessimism of her book, Greenfield describes herself as an optimist and a believer in a better future for her people. She acknowledges that the missing piece in Cosmic Fear is a proposal for positive change, and plans to produce this next. In the meantime, she is a lone, controversial voice in an overheated arena of polarized debate. Some will dismiss her as disingenuous; others will see her as a courageous leader.

Then, now, no longer

Twenty years ago I wrote two short stories and sent them to the New Yorker. Ever the optimist, I falsely mentioned in the cover letter that there were more where those two came from. Why start at the bottom? The New Yorker returned them, likely unread. They did the right thing.

Writing first-rate fiction requires great talent, which I do not have. Even more talent is required for humour or satire. As the old joke goes: "Dying is easy, comedy is hard." This makes Mordecai Richler's achievements all the more remarkable. He was a giant, an excellent novelist, essayist, screenwriter, children's author, journalist and columnist. In all of these roles his wit stamped his work with a unique style.



Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

I found the amount of media attention devoted to his passing and to an assessment of his work to be enormous, reaching almost John Lennonesque proportions. Not only the Montreal Gazette, but also the National Post and the Globe and Mail ran story after story, day after day. I was surprised and pleased.

While Richler is often compared to Philip Roth, I suspect that when Roth passes – in the far distant future – there will not be a comparable outpouring of American commentary. Why this reaction for Richler?

It may be due to his political persona, as he was widely known for his up-front attacks on the excesses of French nationalism in Quebec. Perhaps it reflects Canadian insecurity, since we knew that Richler, like Margaret Atwood, was "world famous, not only in Canada." Certainly his weekly columns brought him to a much wider audience than most novelists could ever reach.

To many non-Jews, and most Québécois, he was seen as a representative Jew. But Jews recognized how in his personal life he managed to distance himself from things Jewish even while he wrestled with Jewish demons in his writing. Marrying a gentile was rare in the Canada of 40 years ago. The rituals and rhythms of Jewish life were largely absent from the Richler household, as far as we can gather.

Richler seemed to be a kind of non-Jewish Jew, even apart from his minimally Jewish family life. Sipping his daily scotch in a bar in the Eastern Townships or in downtown Montreal, smoking up a storm, embracing snooker with a passion, chewing the fat with his rural buddies as well as slick urbanites, Richler was an everyman, at ease with everyone. Yet he was a writer above all else. He was also profoundly Jewish.

He never really left the old Jewish neighbourhood. Richler recalled fondly his youthful escapades carousing along the Seine on Friday nights while singing Adon Olam. I suspect he resented being too young to fight the Nazis in Europe or the British and Arabs soon after in Palestine. His Jewishness gained expression mainly in railing against anti-Semites past and present. He had a soft spot for Israel and for his buddies who made aliyah as part of left-wing Zionist movements. He was fairly learned in matters Jewish, building on the foundation set in his traditional pre-bar mitzvah days. But anything that smacked of conventional or mainstream Jewish life, from synagogues to communal organizations, was a target.

Richler's honest writing about the foibles of his own community also served to debunk some of the heroic myths that surrounded the immigrant Jewish neighbourhood. He wanted, as he often said, "to get it right." While he at times went too far, his basic theme was dead on: Immigrants were not all pious, devoted, law abiding and hard-working, sacrificing their all for their children. He was fascinated with the underbelly of immigrant Jewish life. Not for him was the maudlin veneration of even his own cherished St. Urbain past. In this Richler paralleled what Isaac Bashevis Singer did for the shtetl and eastern European Jewry.

Two old Montreal Jews meet again after a long time. One says "Finkelstein, my old friend, how are you?"

Finkelstein replies: "I am no longer Finkelstein. I heard there is a new custom for people to give themselves classy names based on where they come from. So my name is now C.D. St. Urbain.

The first asks: "I understand the last name, because I remember you grew up on St. Urbain Street. But what are the initials C. D.?"

"Easy," he replies, "corner Duluth."

The Kirshner File

Palestinian school books strike at peace

Less than a year after Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat ushered in the Oslo peace process with the 1993 Declaration of Principles, the Israeli government and the Palestinian Authority signed the Cairo Agreement. Under this accord, Israel and the PA solemnly promised that their educational systems would "contribute to the peace between Israel and the Palestinian people."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Rabin, understandably, assumed that Palestinian school books in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip would foster peace and coexistence with Israel. Was this not, after all, Oslo's raison d'etre?

Before Oslo, Israel methodically removed words, sentences and ideas from texts in the Palestinian curriculum deemed anti-Jewish and anti-Israel. Israeli forces that had captured the West Bank and Gaza in the 1967 Six Day War came upon books in Palestinian classrooms riddled with inflammatory references toward Jews and Israel.

When Israel decided to eliminate these allusions, Egypt and Jordan, which had supplied the objectionable books in the first place, lodged a complaint with the United Nations, claiming that the Israeli government was changing the Palestinian curriculum in contravention of the Geneva Convention.

The United Nations, while ruling that Israel was within its rights to erase offensive terminology and passages, called for an impartial "clearing" system under which a list of suitable Egyptian and Jordanian texts for Palestinian students would be published annually.

However, at the request of the PA and the Arab League, the system was suspended in 1995. In lockstep with this decison, the PA began using Egyptian and Jordanian texts published under its imprimatur.

These books, which were supplanted by new ones last year, reverted to stereotypical portrayals of Jews and Israel, reports The Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace, a nongovernmental organization established in 1998. In general, they depicted Jews and Israelis as cunning and deceitful.

Islamic Education for Ninth Grade, for example, exhorted students to be beware of Jews, who were described as "treacherous and disloyal."

The denial of a Jewish connection with Israel was another common theme. "The Zionists turned their attention towards Palestine as the national homeland of the Jews, while relying on false historical and religious claims," Modern Arab History and Contemporary Problems, a Grade 10 text, stated. In accordance with this line of reasoning, Reader and Literary Texts for Eighth Grade disclaimed that the Western Wall in Jerusalem is Jewish.

Books like Our Country Palestine showed all of Israel as Palestine. And in Atlas of the Arab Homeland and the World, the West Bank and Gaza were marked in green, while Israel, referred to as "occupied Palestine," was drawn in yellow. Israeli cities such as Tel Aviv, Acre, Ashdod and Haifa were defined as Palestinian.

Praising violence as a means by which to regain their rights, Palestinian texts called for jihad (holy war) against Israel. Our Arabic Language for Fifth Grade declared: "Know, my son, that Palestine is your country... Why must we fight the Jews and drive them out of our land?"

The Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace says that PA teachers' guides, which have yet to be amended, are no better.

Zionism is seen as "a racist and aggressive" movement and is equated with fascism and Nazism. Jews are blamed for anti-Semitism.

"There are a number of reasons that caused the Europeans to persecute the Jews, wherever they were," the guide observes.

"The Bible is full of texts that support the Jews' tendency to racial and religious zealotry... they respond(ed) with the spirit of hatred toward other nations... The Jews of Europe were hated because of their hostile Jewish belief towards Christianity, and their seclusion... and their taking over the economy...

"The Jews' feeling of racial, religious, cultural and political superiority and their contact with the nations of the world... was the important impetus for the nations' persecution of them."

Israel's elementary right to exist was decried. As one text put it: "All Arab hearts are devoted to Palestine and (await) the day (when) they will be able to liberate it and expel the thieving aggressor..."

Last September, a PA agency, the Center for Developing the Palestinian Curricula, released 14 revised texts for grades 1 to 6. In analyzing them, The Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace detected positive changes.

They do not advocate Israel's destruction, nor define Jews in overtly anti-Semitic terms. They praise the role of Jews – and Christians – in transmitting knowledge during medieval times.

The new books, however, make no attempt to promote peace with Israel. Peace is neither presented as a goal nor discussed as an option. And while Oslo is mentioned once, and only once, it is not defined as a peace process.

The texts perceive Israel as a foreign implant in the Middle East, view Israel in contexts that breed contempt and omit Israel's name from maps.

"The PA is teaching their children that the Palestinian 'problem' is not Israel's control over the West Bank and Gaza, but Israel's existence," the Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace warns.

It adds: "The new PA school books fail to teach their children to see Israel as a neighbour with whom peaceful relations are expected. They do not teach acceptance of Israel's existence on the national level, nor do they impart tolerance of individual Jews on the personal level."

These findings, to say the least, are disturbing.

If Israel and the Palestinians are ever to live in peace, the PA must clarify its intentions. If the PA's objective is genuine coexistence, as its leaders continually assert, it has no alternative but to revamp its school books, from top to bottom.

Each side has the right to interpret history as it so chooses. This is an inviolate principle. But a red line is crossed when Israel's legitimacy is questioned, when Zionism is likened to Nazism, when jihad is espoused and when Jews are defamed.

Let's be clear. By exposing impressionable Palestinian pupils to anti-Israel and anti-Jewish material, the PA flagrantly violates the spirit and letter of the Oslo accords and renders real peace impossible.

These violations were more or less tolerated by Israeli governments – and by Israel's peace camp – in the interests of advancing the peace process and out of the knowledge that Israel was also breaching the Oslo accords. Through various acts of unilateralism, notably the expansion of settlements in the territories, Israel trifled with Oslo.

Still, it is clear that hateful Palestinian books strike at the heart of peace and peaceful coexistence. Since the collapse of last year's Camp David summit and the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising, Israel can no longer turn a blind eye to such violations.

If the Palestinians are sincerely interested in forging a lasting rapprochement with Israel and the Jewish people, the PA has no choice but to overhaul its school books once and for all.

It is an imperative, especially now when the intifadah threatens to scuttle what is left of what was once a hopeful peace process.

Syrian texts defame Jews

Bashar al-Assad's recent foray into the quagmire of anti-Semitism is shocking but hardly surprising. In the presence of Pope John Paul II, the ignorant, inexperienced president of Syria defamed Jews by suggesting that they "betrayed" Christ and tried to kill Mohammed the Prophet.

This kind of state anti-Semitism, considered beyond the pale in civilized societies, is most pointedly disseminated today in Syrian school books, according to The Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace.

Syrian texts refer to "the aggressive and evil disposition rooted in the Jewish personality." They imply that German Jews committed treason against Germany. They dismiss a Jewish historical attachment to Israel. ("Their claim that they are the descendants of the Hebrews who migrated to Palestine 2,000 years ago is false.")

They maintain that Jews co-operated with "idolators and heretics" against Muslims. They warn that the "criminal intentions" of the Israelis will result in their "extermination."

Bashar claims that he is prepared to sign a peace treaty with Israel should Israel agree to vacate the Golan Heights, but what kind of an agreement does he have in mind when his educational system is irretrievably poisoning the minds of young Syrians?

Commitment or estrangement?

By RABBI J. BENJAMIN FRIEDBERG

Since my retirement, my life has a duality about it: I spend half of each year in Jerusalem and the other half in Toronto.

While in Jerusalem, my wife Lola and I inevitably become part of Israeli society. We are with our Israeli friends, sharing common concerns and attitudes. I introduce this personal note because I reflect on a matter that has been written and spoken about extensively – the drastic reduction in the number of Jews from abroad visiting Israel, part of the general drop in Israel's tourism industry. This drop, of course, is due to what Israelis call hamatzav, the situation, a polite way of saying shootings and bombings.

There is a kind of conventional wisdom here in the Diaspora that Israelis are frightened, depressed, walking with their heads bowed and noses dragging on the ground, feeling isolated and abandoned by Diaspora Jews.

Needless to say, no one in Israel feels good when there is a bombing or when people are shot. There is sadness, anger, a desire for revenge – naturally. And naturally, the bereaved grieve and the wounded and disabled suffer. But there is no general depression and no general fear. Israelis do not walk around with their heads bowed. Nor do they feel isolated – at least the many people, friends, relatives and neighbours with whom we associate don't, tourists or no tourists.

We carry on with life as normally as possible in Israel. We work, we play, we go to theatres, lectures and restaurants. Oh yes, occasionally, on a bus, the question crosses our minds fleetingly, "Is there a suicide bomber aboard?" – but we stay on, somewhat embarrassed by permitting ourselves such thoughts.

Yes, those directly and indirectly involved in the tourist industry are suffering financially and our hearts go out to them. Long-time guides either have to find new jobs or leave the country in order to make a living and support a family. And there are some places, favourite bomb targets like the Mahane Yehuda Market in Jerusalem or the Carmel Market in Tel Aviv, which some people avoid. In Judea, Samaria and Gaza, too, the roads are somewhat hazardous.

But for the most part, people live normal lives. And like everywhere else, the average Israeli doesn't normally interact with tourists (unless they're in the tourist business) and only knows about the absence of visitors from the media.

And yet there are tourists, even if there are not nearly as many as there should be, or as there were. There are solidarity missions, participants in Birthright trips, God bless them, the Maccabiah and the support of many Diaspora organizations. Israelis appreciate that.

At the same time, however, Israelis are disappointed in Diaspora Jewry as they stay away in droves, as though during a time of need, the Diaspora has abandoned Israel. No one can blame anyone for feeling fear in coming. If that's what people feel, that's what they feel. Nevertheless, the unspoken question by Israelis is, "If we are one (UJA slogan), then how come you are afraid to take a little risk in coming to Israel… and it is a very little risk?"

It is as though much of the Diaspora has failed the test of commitment and integrity. Everything worthwhile requires risk taking. Are we to conclude that for some, even many, Israel is not worthwhile enough – not worth taking a slight risk for, not worth commitment or determination? It may be that this distancing in time of need is indicative of a general distancing and estrangement between Israel and the Diaspora. Perhaps what is happening indicates that the ideal of Jewish nationalism (read: Zionism), which fueled the drive and direction of the Jewish people for decades, is cooling down significantly. If so, there is much more about which to worry than declining tourism.

A matter of perspective

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The summer months are a complex time for the Jewish people. We spend weeks contemplating the impact of having lost the Temple. We immerse ourselves in the implications of our precarious positions in world history, climaxing with Tisha B'Av.

Within a few weeks beyond that date we enter the month of Elul – again a handful of weeks preparing ourselves for the upcoming High Holy Days. The month of Av speaks to the history of our nation while the month of Elul minimizes our focus, beginning with a focus on ourselves as individuals. But are these truly two separate times or should we carry Av into Elul?

There is no denying that it is a good and healthy endeavour to spend some time each year in self-reflection. Elul is a time to ask the private questions. We all know that the face we present to the world is not always in line with who we are inside. Elul is the time to realign ourselves and this can only be done privately.

By working on ourselves and improving who we are and then interacting with the world, we are inevitably changing that world. But can all this national and personal reflection be too overwhelming?

Certainly some time spent this way is healthy, but to spend all of Av and Elul in such pursuits might be too much. The answer lies in perspective.

Although we are to focus on the hard personal questions during Elul, we must bring some of the larger focus of Av into the picture. Although we are individuals, we are never devoid of our communities, and our communities are never in isolation from the world.

However, looking at all that is wrong in our lives might lead to a negative state of mind, making it difficult to focus on the positive. This is where the pekaleh theory comes into play. A good friend of mine introduced me to this theory and I would like to share it.

According to this view, we spend Elul defining all that is wrong in our lives, figuratively putting everything into a little package, or pekaleh. If everyone were to put their pekalech on a shelf so you could see how large they were and some of the issues contained in theirs, you would willingly choose your own. In fact, you would probably dance with it all the way home.

Your personal pekaleh is an intrinsic part of who you are. It shapes the journey you will take to improving yourself and your world. While bemoaning how overwhelming our personal hardships can sometimes be, we must always be sensitive to the fact that there is no lack of personal suffering in the world.

Elul affords us the time to focus on the individual but the remnants of Av remind us that we are never truly individuals. Judaism does not abide someone's insensitivity to another person's suffering. The Talmud states that if two people begin to pray together and one finishes first and leaves before the other is finished, then that person's prayer is torn to pieces.

The synagogue is not only a place to express ourselves to God but it is also a place to hear the murmurs of other people's prayers. There is a melody to prayer beyond the tune and the chazzan. There is a comfort within the sound of the room that defies explanation. The droning of the prayer, the music of the community, reminds us to always find a moment and listen to the whispers of another person's heartfelt plea.

New cottage country shul

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Finding a shul in cottage country can be a real challenge. Finding two in the same town is definitely exceptional.

By this fall, Belle Ewart, a one-hour drive from Toronto on the shores of Lake Simcoe, will be one such place.

Long time Beth Israel Congregation will be joined by a new synagogue in nearby Tent City, thanks to the generosity of Hamilton physicians Joseph and Cheryl Greenbaum, who donated part of a lot that they had purchased for their own use.

The only conditions they imposed were that the davening must be Orthodox and that the chief rabbinate's prayer for the State of Israel is to be recited.

The congregation, called The Tent City Jewish Congregation, has been davening since 1965 in a community centre, unofficial leader Myer Feldman, a Toronto lawyer, told The CJN. Not only was the congregation outgrowing the premises, but it was becoming more and more difficult to co-ordinate their activities with the centre's.

Feldman said that while the Greenbaums donated enough land to build a shul, funds to build and furnish the building will be raised internally.

With a twinkle in his eye, Feldman suggested that "we would be happy to accept an Aron Kodesh someone has in storage, or a sefer Torah or siddurim and Chumashim."

Architect Yisroel Idels, who also designed Beth Avraham Yoseph congregation in Thornhill and the new Chabad @ Flamingo, among others, designed the structure to fit in with the surrounding cottages, Feldman said.

The synagogue will be just over 2,700 square feet, air conditioned and heated, and will include a sanctuary-cum-study hall, a kitchen, room for simchahs and a small library. It will also be wheelchair accessible.

Relations with the surrounding community are very good. "When we went to the town of Innisfil [where Belle Ewart is located] for rezoning, we were welcomed with open arms. The neighbours all supported us and the town was very kind, helpful and encouraging."

Construction is expected to start shortly, and the structure should be ready in about two months, although probably too late to be used this year.

Feldman is enthusiastic about the spirit that permeates the services. "All three branches [Reform, Conservative and Orthodox] daven together. You can't explain the experience – everyone goes away on a high. Everyone is a friend."

After each Shabbat service, Feldman said, the kids prepare a kiddush, "the usual – herring, kichel, kugel, schnapps." There is lots of singing and Feldman gives a speech in which he tries to tie in the portion of the week with whatever simchah anyone there is celebrating.

"We take a lot of pride in what happens here," Feldman said.

Tu b'Av on the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

With Tisha b'Av over, we leave the saddest part of the calendar behind us and turn to one of the most joyous (and least known) holidays, Tu b'Av. In an interesting convergence of old and new, this ancient holiday has become a popular time for modern singles' events. Today, Tu b'Av and romance on the Internet.

The Mishnah (Ta'anit 4:8), surprisingly, declares, "There were no greater holidays for Israel than Tu b'Av and Yom Kippur, for on them the girls of Jerusalem used to go out in borrowed white dresses... and dance in the vineyards. What would they say? 'Young man, lift up your eyes and see what you choose for yourself. Do not set your eyes on beauty but set them on good family. Grace is deceitful and beauty is vain. But a woman that fears God, she will be praised.'"

(You can read the Mishnah online if you have Hebrew fonts installed [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/mishna/tani04.html]).

Yosef Abramowitz and Rabbi Susan Silverman suggest that we could learn a great deal from those ancient courting practices [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/1270.html]. "The young girls borrowed white dresses so that the young men could not choose among them according to materialistic concerns... Today, we live in a world that is status- and fashion-conscious, a world of beauty pageants and beauty ideals set by television and movies, and some synagogues are even described as 'meat markets' for looking over the unmarried merchandise. Tu b'Av tells us to look beneath the surface when looking for (or at) a life partner, just as Yom Kippur forces us to look deep into ourselves before God grants us life anew. Like Yom Kippur it is a time for reflection and introspection. But instead of being an individual process, it is a mutual, shared experience between two people."

The Talmud gives six reasons Tu b'Av was made a holiday [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/3weeks/]. Among them: Marriage between different tribes of Israel was permitted that day. In the desert, a ban on inter-tribal marriage had insured that land would not pass out of the hands of the tribe it originally belonged to. According to Virtual Jerusalem, "The ability for all of the tribes to marry each other – necessary to facilitate a deep, fundamental sense of Jewish oneness – is worth celebrating." [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/tubav/backgnd.htm]

Because of its connection to love and courting, Tu b'Av is often now described as the Jewish Valentine's Day. It was only after Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, author of Kosher Sex, was challenged for participating in a Valentine's Day event that he began to examine the importance of Tu b'Av. Rabbi Boteach acknowledges that although Valentine's Day has been secularized, its roots are Christian. His response: "I encourage the repossession of our own Jewish day of love: Tu b'Av." [http://www.momentmag.com/archive/sept00/extra20.html]

Nowadays in Israel, Tu b'Av is celebrated by all-night rock concerts, most noticeably on the shores of the Sea of Galilee at Hof Tzemach. Other festivals feature chassidic singers entertaining newly engaged and newlywed couples [http://www.sympatya.co.il/tu-bav1.htm]. (This year Tu b'Av falls on Saturday, Aug. 4; so its observance will be delayed until the conclusion of Shabbat.)

Despite a resurgence of Tu b'Av, Orna Coussin argues in Ha'aretz that Valentine's Day and heart-shaped lollipops are making inroads in Israel [http://www.gsnonweb.com/gsnlib_a/gsn2001/2001_02/20010214/91667.html]. Even Dry Bones creator Ya'acov Kirschen wades into the Valentine's Day/Tu b'Av controversy [http://info.jpost.com/2000/Supplements/DryBones/D97818MP.HTML].

So how should you mark the day? Rabbi Silverman and Yosef Abramowitz have a few suggestions:

- If you are like us, we always remember much too late to prepare Rosh Hashanah cards. Instead of waiting for the last minute, gather your family together on Tu b'Av, make a list of all the people you love and who love you, and address the Rosh Hashanah Card envelopes together.
- Teach children to look beyond physical beauty to seek partners with strong Jewish values.
- Arrange to be alone together. [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/1273.html]

And one last suggestion for people who are not too good with words but still want to express their feelings [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/2300.html]. Like many Jewish holidays, Tu b'Av falls midway through the Jewish lunar month when there is always a full moon out. Follow Jill Suzanne Jacobs' instructions and build a Tu b'Av mobile full of Jewish symbols (a full moon, stars, hearts, dancing figures and Jerusalem's city walls) to complement the romantic holiday.

CHAT grad has impressive resume

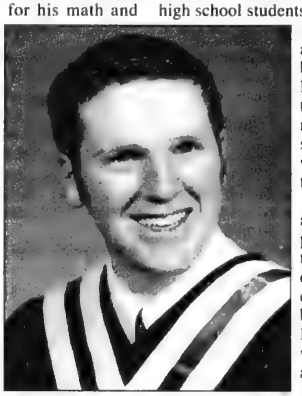
By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Matya Gilbert-Schachter's resume is impressive.

Three pages long, it lists the 24 awards he has won, mainly for his math and science prowess, as well as the 17 extra-curricular activities, 12 volunteer positions and seven jobs he's held during his four years at CHAT.

"I did it by working hard," he said of his busy schedule and academic success. "I kept taking more and more on and was somehow able to juggle it all."

Many of his proudest accomplishments were added to his c.v. during this past year.



Matya Gilbert-Schacter

Graduating with a 96 percent average, Gilbert-Schachter, 18, received a scholastic award at the CHAT graduation, and carried away both the mathematics and physics department awards as well as the Irv Wilson Memorial Scholarship for outstanding academic achievement.

As he accepted an offer to attend the engineering science program at the University of Toronto in the fall, Gilbert-Schachter was awarded a $3,000 U of T entrance scholarship. He also earned a Leonardo da Vinci Competition Scholars Award, an engineering competition sponsored by U of T.

He recently represented the province at the American Regional Math League held at Penn State University, and says he placed second in the team competition and won individual high scorer among his team, tying with the second best scorer across the country.

This year, as a result of his leadership skills and "extraordinary volunteer experience," Gilbert-Schachter was one of 26 Grade 12 students selected by Ontario's Lt.-Gov. Hilary Weston to participate in the First Connections Programme, which landed him a summer internship at Environics, a public opinion research firm.

"One of the greatest parts of the First Connections program is that I get to explore my other interests. I've known all along that I'm talented in math, but I'm also interested in social sciences, like politics, economics and law. I get to apply math to the fields I'm interested in," he says.

"They've fully accepted me," says Gilbert-Schachter in reference to his co-workers at Environics. "I'm getting all sorts of work. It's a great experience."

His math and science abilities took him all the way to Israel last year. He was one of 70 students selected from around the world to participate in SciTec 2000, a five-week summer research program for high school students.

"The program was a great compromise because not only did I get the opportunity to further develop my math and science skills, but on the weekends I got to tour the country."

Of his non-academic accomplishments he says that "I'm most proud of coaching and refereeing house league basketball at the BJCC. It was fun working with kids and getting to teach them something."

Gilbert-Schachter says he played for the CHAT team in grades 9 and 10 and enjoyed being able to pass on what he learned.

In Grade 11 he participated in the March of the Living, which he says "was a spectacular, life-changing program. It was incredibly educational and emotional."

One of the nicest aspects of the trip, he says, was being selected as part of a delegation of six students who got to meet Poland's prime minister.

Gilbert-Schachter says he loved his time at high school. "At times it was a struggle, but I was also surrounded by such great friends who made it all worth while."

And, he says, "I couldn't have achieved [any of] this success without the teachers at CHAT, especially [Aviva] Heller and [Efie] Lauferman. They were always there to give me an extra hand [when I was studying for the math competitions.]

"[Eli] Honig helped me with the engineering competition...It's these teachers that made CHAT what it is and I'm confident that I learned more at CHAT than I would have anywhere else."

He says that he's more anxious than nervous to be starting university. "It's a change. It's something new, but I'm ready for whatever it is that awaits me."

Gilbert-Schachter says his parents are very proud of him. Though it would seem that his younger brother has big shoes to fill, another of Gilbert-Schachter's accomplishments is humbleness.

"My brother has found his own path," he explains. "He's extremely skilled in computers. He's far surpassed me at that."

Yiddish concert draws over 2,000 people

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Threatening weather did not stop more than 2,000 people of all ages from partying at the recent annual Summer Yiddish Folk Concert held at Mel Lastman Square.

The atmoshpere at the standing room only performance – featuring the Toronto klezmer ensemble Beyond the Pale, and soloists Michael Smolash and Bronna Levy – was like a simchah with the audience clapping, singing along, dancing, and meeting and greeting friends.

Beyond the Pale's repertoire included Eastern European folk songs, reggae, the funk sound and several original compositions.

Instrumentalist and composer Eric Stein, 28, founder and leader of the group, played the mandolin and tsimbl. He was accompanied by violinist Anne Lindsay, Sasha Luminsky on accordion, Bret Higgins on bass, and Martin Van de Ven on clarinet.

In a somber mood, Smolash dedicated Autumn Song to Mordechai Richler who died recently in Montreal.

Bronna Levy, a three-time scholarship participant of Montreal's KlezKanada Festival, performed Tsigaynerl – The Little Gypsy and hand-clapping melodies such as Shabbos Shabbos and Oy Mame, Bin Ikh Farlibt.

Smolash and Levy combined their talents in the exciting Alevay and Der Ershter Vals to which they sang and waltzed.

The concert was produced by UJA Federation committee for Yiddish with support of the City of Toronto, Toronto Arts Council and the Metro Credit Union.

The concert was dedicated to the memory of Sam Grajcar, a supporter of Yiddish and a longtime lover of Yiddish song. David Abramowitz served as MC.

Among the volunteer ushers was a group of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) students. Yiddish is now a subject on the CHAT curriculum.

Ethel Sum Cooper, chair of the committee for Yiddish stressed "the need for the entire Jewish community to throw its support behind the continuity of Yiddish."

She said the language, its history and culture "is the foundation of our Ashkenazi Jewish community of Toronto."

She said that the committee for Yiddish presents classes for children and adults, Yiddish courses at University of Toronto, and Yiddish programming in the community.

"We are endeavouring to plant a love and knowledge of Yiddish in the hearts and minds of all Jews," she said.

Sum Cooper encouraged organizations, schools, landsmanshaft, congregations and other groups to continue planning programs "celebrating our wonderful language and beautiful culture."

Air force vet fought in Israel's war of independence

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Sydney Cohen arrived in Israel in 1948, there was still a lot of pioneering work left to do.

Not of the swamp-draining or kibbutz-building kind, but something more pressing and dangerous.

Israel was in a war for its very survival and the country's armed forces were fending off attacks from its Arab neighbours. The ground units were already established but the air force, that was another matter entirely.

There was no Jewish air corps prior to the British departure, no sabra pilots and no aircraft.

Cohen, a native of South Africa, was a dashing young pilot with a distinguished service record from World War II. Flying P-40s for the RAF in the North African and Italian campaigns, Cohen recorded 310 missions, mostly as an escort for bombers and in strafing runs on German forces.

Along with hundreds of other Jewish and gentile pilots from Allied forces, Cohen joined Machal, the volunteer force that proved instrumental in Israel's War of Independence. Cohen was eventually to become leader of Squadron 101, one of Israel's first air units.

Cohen was in Toronto recently for a family function. While here, the 80-year-old reminisced about his younger days when he courted danger on a daily basis.

"I'm the dashing young fighter pilot 60 years later," he said.

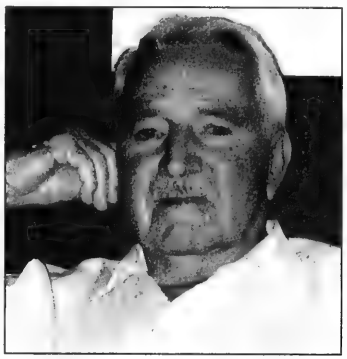
Cohen was born in the tiny Afrikaans town of Bothaville in the Orange Free State. His family had moved there from Scotland. In his youth, he worked in the local gold mine and later he took a job in an explosives factory. In 1939, when the war started, he volunteered for the British air force, the RAF.

He chose the RAF because one of his brothers was already enjoying recreational flying, "and I drifted into it."

He was assigned to North Africa during the desert war, where Britain was trying to stop Erwin Rommel's advance towards the oil fields of the Middle East. Cohen flew U.S.-built P-40s, a sturdy aircraft that didn't carry the cachet of the Spitfire, but which could take a lot of punishment.

On many occasions his aircraft took gunfire from the quicker, more maneuverable Messerschmidts, but "we always managed to get them back."

As one of the first British pilots to see action in North Africa, Cohen learned invaluable survival skills. The aphorism, "beware the Hun in the sun," stood him in good stead as he avoided attacks from above by German fighters. Some of the less experienced British pilots sometimes succumbed to the temptation of low-flying, easy German prey, laid out as a trap to entice Allied pilots away from formation. On one occasion, he lost two of his wingmen who took the bait and found himself alone, being chased by four Messerschmidts before he managed to elude them, Cohen recalled.



Sydney Cohen

During furloughs from active service, Cohen would meet his brothers George and Morris, who were also in the British armed forces, and travel to Alexandria for holidays. On one occasion, the three brothers, who were not particularly Zionistic at the time, travelled to Palestine for a visit. During a stay at kibbutz Ein Hod, the locals "made a big fuss about us. It was unusual to see three Jewish guys in uniform."

Back on the front, Cohen followed the British army as it pushed the Germans back to Tunisia. From North Africa, he was assigned to Italy, where he fought until the end of the war.

With Germany defeated, Cohen returned to South Africa where he enrolled in medical school. His studies were cut short by the call to help Israel and he joined about 600 South African Jews in Machal.

"The time I spent in Palestine sharpened my appetite and so I thought I'd help them," he said.

Israel had acquired a handful of surplus planes – Messerschmidts – from Czechoslovakia, and Cohen began the odd exercise of training in the planes he had shot down a few years before.

Motti Alon was leader of Squadron 101 and Ezer Weizman, later to become a famous general and Israel's president, was a squadron member as well. When Alon died in a landing accident, Cohen was appointed squadron leader. Among his crew was a melange of Allied pilots from Britain, Canada and the United States. Buzz Beurling, Canada's famed ace, volunteered for the Israeli Air Force (IAF), but was killed when the plane he was flying from Europe to Israel crashed, he recalled.

Cohen flew 60 missions for the IAF, escorting the three Flying Fortress bombers the country had acquired and strafing Egyptian troops.

The British, his old mates, did not remain neutral in the fight. One of their spy planes, a Mosquito, was shot down by one of the two new Mustang aircraft Israel acquired and RAF pilots flew for Egypt late in the war when Israel threatened the Suez Canal, he said.

The IAF outshone its Arab foes – the Egyptian pilots "weren't very good" – but it suffered from growing pains that limited its effectiveness. Ground crews were unfamiliar with the planes and early on, did not synchronize the guns with the propellers. On one occasion he noticed he was experiencing a rough ride after clearing his guns. When he returned to base he learned that he had been shooting his own propeller, Cohen said.

One Mustang pilot who had shot down the Mosquito cursed when he thought his gun had jammed in the middle of the engagement. In fact, he had exhausted the meager ammunition allotment he had been given. Altogether, Cohen's squadron of about a dozen planes shot down 20 enemy aircraft.

With the war over, Cohen retuned to South Africa and his medical studies. In 1965, an old squadron friend dangled a plum job in front of him and convinced Cohen to return to Israel. Cohen was hired as El Al's chief medical officer and while on reserve duty, he served in the IAF medical section. During the 1967 and 1973 wars, as well as during the War of Attrition (1970) he served in medical evacuation units. He left the IAF in the mid-1970s and continued his work with El Al. He also ran the aviation section for the Institute for Medical Data.

Even today, he maintains contact with his old unit. He's often invited to attend Squadron 101 functions and he rates the current crop of pilots as among the best Israel ever produced.

The IAF's quality jumped notably after it began acquiring top-of-the-line American equipment, like its current generation of F-16s, which Squadron 101 now flies.

Israeli pilots often excel at U.S. Top Gun schools and from what he's seen, they exhibit "a natural ability... They're way above what we were as pilots, but they all acknowledge that we started it.

"When I think how it all started, it is an amazing transformation," he said.

David Mock appointed dean of U of T dental faculty

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The University of Toronto's faculty of dentistry has a new dean.

He is Winnipeg-born David Mock, a specialist in oral pathology.

Mock, the first Jewish dean of the faculty, which is Canada's largest, was appointed on July 1 for a seven-year term.

Chief dentist at Mount Sinai Hospital from 1992 to 2000, he attended William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate in Toronto. He then continued his studies at the U of T.

He graduated in 1968 with a Doctor of Dental Surgery, and after a one-year internship at the Toronto Hospital and a year of general practice in Mississauga, he took up graduate studies in oral pathology.

A member of Holy Blossom Temple, Mock has big plans to upgrade the faculty of dentistry.

"Like the university as a whole, it is under considerable fiscal restraints after 10 years of budget cuts," said Mock, who began teaching at the U of T in 1970 as a demonstrator.

"We must find innovative approaches to funding for rejuvenation and replacement of equipment and additional funding for student assistance.

"We also need to find funding for an addition to our building to accommodate growing research activity. The research capabilities of the faculty need to be expanded and updated."

As well, he said he plans to revamp the undergraduate curriculum to meet the needs of the 21st century.

"Although it is important to ensure that students graduate with the skills and knowledge necessary to treat patients appropriately, they must also be able to evaluate new ideas and techniques and become life long learners."

The faculty will also develop more collaborative programs with other health care centres and hire new staff.

Although he was born in Winnipeg, he was brought to Toronto at the age of one.

His parents, Morris and Bessie, owned and operated a grocery store, first in the Kensington Market area, then on College Street, Sheppard and finally on Wilson Avenue.

David Mock

"They worked together for 12 to 14 hours a day, six to seven days a week. Like many Jews who left Poland and Russia in the 1920s, they worked hard and gave their children a strong work ethic and a sense of community responsibility."

Mock decided to study dentistry while in grade 13 after attending a careers day event at Mackenzie Collegiate.

When he entered the faculty, the last undercurrents of anti-Semitism were slipping away.

"I do not recall official restrictions, but the faculty has had a history of anti-Semitism... I did experience anti-Semitic comments and situations as an undergraduate student from selected staff, but these were already starting to diminish."

By the late 1960s and early 1970s, he said, the situation had changed for the better as more Jewish professors were hired.

"I feel that racism and anti-Semitism have been eliminated from the faculty at this time."

Dentistry has changed since he was an undergraduate.

As he put it: "The science of dentistry has grown and dental research has overlapped with basic human biology.

"Dental research has improved the quality of life for the population in general. People are keeping their teeth longer. The relationship between oral health and general health has been demonstrated."

A year ago, Mock was involved in the creation of the Wasser Pain Management Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital, and was named its associate director.

"This is a unique unit combining the talents of various health care practitioners for patient care, teaching and research."

Mock, who was president of Alpha Omega Fraternity in his final year as a U of T student, has two sons, Steven and Daniel.

Rowing – The Jewish Way

Yeshiva University decided to take up rowing. After lengthy and arduous training, they challenged Harvard University to a race over one kilometer. The Yeshiva team lost by 800 meters. They found this incomprehensible. A spy was sent to investigate Harvard's training methods. The spy returned. He said, 'I think I know why they are beating us. They have 8 fellows rowing and only one guy yelling.'

Polonshy heads new technology institute

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Jewish college administrator has been named to lead Canada's newest university, the Ontario Institute of Technology, based in Oshawa.

Gary Polonsky's appointment was announced by Ontario's finance minister, Jim Flaherty, in his May 9 budget speech.

Polonsky, 59, will continue serving as president of Oshawa's Durham College, a position he has held since 1988.

The Ontario Institute of Technology will open in September 2003 with eight start-up programs and about 400 students.

Born in Thunder Bay, Ontario, where he lived for his first 40 years, Polonsky holds a BSc from Lakehead University, an MA from Gonzaga University in Washington and a PhD from the University of Toronto.

Prior to being named president and chief executive officer of Durham College, Polonsky was president of Red River Community College in Winnipeg.

He began his academic career at Confederation College in Thunder Bay. He was chair of the trades and technology programs.

The Ontario Institute of Technology, to be located on a farm once owned by business mogul E.P. Taylor, will dispense arts and science programs.

It will also offer courses in six fields: advanced manufacturing, business and information technology, education, health science, nuclear technology and safety and policing and community safety.

Polonsky expects an enrollment of 6,500 by 2009.

"In addition to our market-driven programs, we will offer a number of unique student services dedicated to the individual success of each student," he said.

"We will also guarantee the quality of each graduate's work," he added. "If an employer is not satisfied with a graduate, he or she will be up-educated at our expense and at the employer's and graduate's convenience."

Turning to Durham College, Polonsky claimed it has the highest job rate for grads in Ontario, as well as a first-class skills training centre in Whitby.

"We are also about to embark on a capital expansion program that will not only greatly expand the campus but transform it into a national showpiece."

'We will guarantee the quality of each graduate's work'

The first phase of the expansion will be ready in about 18 months.

Polonsky, a governor of the National Quality Institute, is married and has three grown children and four grandchildren.

His father, Allen, was born in a shtetl near Kiev, Ukraine. He worked in the car industry until he was 77, and was subsequently executive director of the Histadrut in western Canada.

His mother, Rose Daien, born in Winnipeg, was an employee in the Thomson newspaper chain.

"One of my grandfathers was Samuel Polonsky, an Orthodox rabbi who had congregations in Thunder Bay, Saskatchewan [Hirst and Melfort] and Winnipeg. My other grandfather, Moshe Daien, was an Orthodox cantor in Winnipeg."

In his spare time, Polonsky is a song writer, with one album, Nine Feet Tall, to his credit.

"Some of my songs have Jewish themes, such as one on the Holocaust called I'll Never Forget."

"I plan to do at least one more album," said Polonsky, "but not for a while."

Korry's, Danforth usher in new century in style

Steeped in a rich tradition that spans five decades, Korry's is much more than a menswear store; it's a symbol of old-fashioned business values successfully transposed into the modern era. Mirroring the growth of Korry's, the Danforth has evolved into Canada's most exciting modern shopping district while retaining its centuries-old European appeal.

Saul Korman, the irrepressible owner of Korry's, has made "569 Danforth" one of Canada's best-publicized addresses. "We're trying to give 10 Sussex Drive a run for its money" [in address recognition], says Korman, "and we can definitely dress you better than they can."

His own address is not the only one Korman plugs. At every opportunity, he'll tell anyone and everyone, both on the air and in person, where to dine and shop in GreekTown. "It's all here," he crows. "The souvlaki's on the grill; I just add a little sizzle." Most other shopping venues, according to Korman, fizzle by comparison with the Danforth. No shopping centre would compel you, as GreekTown does, to walk its length and breadth, experiencing its sights, tastes and sounds. "Three hundred one-of-a-kind restaurants and shops, fresh air and sunshine, or a mall full of chain stores. You decide."

"Coming down here every day is like free airfare to Greece. I call it work, but to me it's play"

Unlike the mall's not-so-merry-go-round of sameness, contends Korman, the Danforth is not a shopping centre but rather but a centre OF shopping, OF dining, OF life. It's an opportunity to dine indoors or out on exquisite European cuisine, or enjoy a beverage in any one of dozens of charming sidewalk patios and cafés. To see the sky by day, or stars by night, and feel the sun's warmth directly — not diffused through glass, reflected off steel or absorbed by concrete. It is, notes Korman, the one place in Toronto where "you don't have to talk about what you'd LIKE to be doing, and where you'd like to be doing it, because you ARE doing it. I love it here. Coming down here every day is like getting free airfare to Greece. I call it work, but to me it's play. I enjoy it so much that I'd pay to work in my own store, if I had do." And, he winks, "I do."

The Danforth's merits and virtues as a shopping destination and cultural hub are well-documented. Less known is that fact that there are not one but two synagogues in the area, underscoring its Jewish presence.

At a time when there are more options for business wear than ever before, Korry's can help you walk the tightrope between acceptable casual dressing and downright sloppiness. The rules of today's office attire may have changed, but the rules of appropriate appearance have not. No matter what your business, it is to everyone's benefit if staff and executives alike maintain a certain level of professionalism.

To assist corporations in achieving this highly desirable goal, the men's wear industry has formed the Back to Business/Dress Up Thursdays committee. This is a non-profit, grassroots coalition of North American men's fashion retailers, manufacturers and sales agencies dedicated to solving the style dilemmas that many companies have found themselves facing since the introduction of so-called Casual Fridays.

As a pioneer and leading proponent of this movement, Korman makes numerous speaking engagements to promote it, but is happiest dispensing knowledge, expertise and advice one-on-one at 569 Danforth. A visit to Korry's will enable you not only to enjoy the ambience of the Danforth first-hand, but also to pick up a free copy of the Back to Business Guide, a highly detailed, beautifully illustrated guide to business dressing. It contains a wealth of information and specific suggestions on how to dress, as well as a number of observations by various media illustrating the corporate world's fashion parameters. The

What to wear, how to wear it — and why

National Post, for example, notes that "In dressing casual you want to find the look that means you mean business. You are not there to mow the lawn." The National Post also observes that "Young people are starting to dress up again. The idea is that you can look successful but you don't have to dress up as your father did some 20 years ago."

You can now visit Korry's anytime at www.korrys.com and get the latest scoop on his in-store collections, advice on what to buy and how to coordinate it. The site also offers valuable tips on wardrobe maintenance, and even recommends which dry cleaners will give you best results. If it relates to looking your best, you'll find it on Korry's website. You can also visit the Back to Business website at 1dressup.com.

Korry's press release is another valuable source of information about how to dress for work and play, and includes a number of fascinating anecdotes, such as this one on the history of pockets:

> Often the difference between what is dress and what is casual is a subtle one. The jacket pocket is a good example: The dressiest kind, because it is the simplest, is the double-seamed, or bosom pocket — in other words, just a plain, sewn-in pocket with no flap. The flapped pocket is slightly more casual. Why? Because over two hundred and fifty years ago, English country squires started putting flaps on their "sporting" jacket pockets to keep the rain out. The most casual pocket of all is the sewn-on patch pocket. This, too, is due to its sporting origin, because the squires found they required wide, deep pockets on their shooting jackets to hold assorted small game and gun ammunition."

Korry's invites you to come down to the Danforth, pocket a little sunshine, and enjoy a North America's largest street festival, the Taste of the Danforth, August 10, 11 and 12. When you do, make sure to stop by #569, where Shalom! and Opa! go hand in hand.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Imagine strolling down Danforth Avenue surrounded by thousands of people, all savouring souvlaki, dolmades, and kedftedes, to name but a few culinary delights. This year, August 10-12, GreekTown on the Danforth welcomes thousands of visitors from across Ontario, Quebec and the northern USA to the Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth.

Entering its 8th year, Canada's largest food festival (and North America's largest Greek festival) attracted a record crowd of 1 million people in 2000. Over 100 restaurants -- mostly Greek, but also Japanese, Cuban, Indian, Italian, and Mexican — offer "tastes" from $1 – $3 at "tasting" stations in front of their establishment.

In keeping with the multicultural spirit, the Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth offers three live stages. The VISA International Stage presents Latin, Armenian, Flamenco and Celtic music. The Greek Stage showcases Greek music and dancing, including the famous Nefeli Dance Theatre. And this year, the Main Stage will feature more Greek music (in response to overwhelming demand from Canadians, both Greek and otherwise), and famous Canadian bands like Crash Test Dummies (www.crashtestdummies.com) and The Skydiggers (www.skydiggers.com).

This year, for the first time, visit the Greek Village, which will host the Krinos Foods Product Tent, World of Vacations, and the Royal Bank. Sit down in the Village's Boutari Wine Garden and sip a glass of chilled white wine. It's the next best thing to being in Greece!

And bring the children! This year, VISA Canada, in cooperation with the Ontario Science Centre, will bring Circus exhibitors from a new exhibit at the Ontario Science Centre. The Shoppers Drug Mart Children's Area delights children from 1 to 8 years. And if you have a "tween" at home, bring him or her to the Toronto Maple Leafs Hockey Area or the new Toronto Rock Lacrosse display.

Says Alex Alexakis, General Manager of Krinos Foods Canada, "We are proud to be the presenting sponsor of the Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth. Cuisine is the international language. People want to entertain their friends and family. We Greeks are known for our hospitality. The Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth is an extension of our homes. We welcome everyone again this year and promise you won't leave hungry!"

Visit www.TasteoftheDanforth.com for further details. If you're travelling to Toronto, a special package has been offered by VIA Rail and Delta Chelsea Hotels; information can be found on the web site.

The Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth is proud to have raised over $300,000 to date for the Toronto East General Hospital, and looks forward to your visit. It's a rare opportunity to sample wonderful cuisine and other aspects of a culture, and contribute to a great cause while doing so. Enjoy!

Pan's Mediterranean flair draws celebs

Is it Greek, or is it Mediterranean? Only your palate knows for sure. The culinary tale spun by Pan defies labelling, but the subtle textural details that have made it the Danforth's only three-star Greek restaurant, and "one of the city's best" according to Toronto Life magazine, have also spread its reputation to the four corners of North America. On any given night, you'll find celebrities — particularly the show business variety — relaxing and enjoying Pan's casual yet intimate ambience and light touch of elegance.

PAN ON THE DANFORTH

Visit us at toronto.com

For celebrity and layperson alike, it's a relief from the "same old same old" — an adventure in a new and exciting world of dewdrop freshness and taste.

Pan's success depends not on a huge menu, but on a limited number of superb dishes prepared with ingredients so fresh you'd swear they'd been picked minutes before. In practical terms, this means even mainstream appetizers like tzatziki and taramosalata take on a tantalizing new dimension. Salads are as salads should be: crisp, light and elevating. Two favourite appetizers: the warm artichoke and new potato salad, and mussels steamed in wine.

Among the entrées, Pan's moussaka — both traditional and vegetarian — deserve curtain calls, as does its rack of lamb. The Lemon Roasted Chicken Breast and Santorini Chicken are widely sought after; no one does chicken like Pan does.

As befits a genuine Mediterranean menu, Pan's daily selection of fresh fish and seafood is resplendent with riches. You won't find a better grilled sea bass anywhere — not even in Greece!

Pan, of course, is a pun: the cooking vessel, and the Greek nature spirit, known for the sweet, enticing music of his pipes.

Pan will, indeed, entice you to a romantic candlelit dinner, on the patio or indoors, with soft music forming a backdrop for intimate, relaxed conversation. And you won't even need to feel self-conscious about gawking at celebrities; you'll be far too busy enjoying your meal.

CIBC makes difference in community

As Community Manager for East Toronto, Dave D'Amico has a twofold responsibility: one, to ensure a high quality of service within his member branches; and two, to promote goodwill and improve the quality of life in the surrounding community.

Dave D'Amico
East Toronto Community Manager
416-421-0051

Not unique to East Toronto, this approach is part of a company-wide commitment to providing help where help is needed. Underscoring this fact, in 2000 the CIBC donated some $35 million to a wide variety of charities and causes, including the Baycrest Centre, Mount Sinai Hospital, Community Centre 55, Toronto East General Hospital, several schools, and countless community projects.

D'Amico favours a hands-on approach that sees him personally participating in fund-raising and other charitable events. He also takes pleasure in encouraging employees, associates and friends to do likewise.

D'Amico brings to the table an extensive background in both banking and volunteer work. And as someone who has lived and worked in the East Toronto area for a number of years, he is well-positioned to turn CIBC's strong presence in the area (19 branches) to good account.

Building goodwill starts within each branch, he says. "We want every single visit to be a happy one for our customers. This is a standard we strive to uphold each and every day." Good works outside the branch are a natural extension of this philosophy, he says. "We want people to think of the CIBC not only as a great place to bank, but as a good neighbour."

D'Amico's approachability, easygoing manner and work ethic have endeared him to East Toronto business people and members of the general community, and he relishes the opportunity to serve. The sense that he is helping to make a difference gives him "all the gratification I need. Giving back to the community isn't something that's nice to do, it's something we have to do."

Astoria's souvlaki judged best in major media polls

Think "Danforth", and you're liable to think "Astoria." In the 25 years since it opened, this venerable "institution of higher dining" has come to symbolize the culinary qualities the Danforth is known for: great food, great quality, and great value.

Indeed, many of Astoria's original customers are still regulars two decades later, and wouldn't dream of going anywhere else.

Astoria's now-famous "souvlaki window", always a beehive of activity, is an indelible image of Danforth life. And what souvlaki! Judged "Best of the City" by Toronto Life and "Best of Toronto" by Now Magazine, Astoria's souvlaki helped make it a multiple winner of the Toronto Sun's Readers' Choice Award as Toronto's favourite Greek restaurant. Other jewels on the menu include hearty moussaka, exquisite broiled sea bass and salmon steaks – and Greek appetizers like grilled kalamari and grilled octopus, if you can keep your souvlaki craving at bay long enough to sample them.

Location and atmosphere are other Astoria assets. For a big restaurant, it's remarkably cozy, due to its corner location, dual outdoor patios (the Danforth's largest), and quiet, richly appointed interior.

Heading eastbound on Bloor, you know you're on the Danforth once you hit Broadview; but you don't really feel it until Astoria's white facade with its pale blue trim leaps joyously into view, bidding you "Welcome to the Danforth" in words that the food lover in you understands so well.

Maxi's fashion flair a hit with clients, critics

It's New York. It's Milan. It's Paris. To its devoted customers, it's Maxi Boutique — a place to find cutting-edge ladies' fashions and the kind of knowledge and one-on-one personal service that comes with a 32-year history of retail excellence.

MAXI BOUTIQUE
575 Danforth Avenue
E-mail: Maxiboutique@sympatico.ca

Women from all over North America seek out Maxi not only for leading designer labels but also for expertise in fitting and coordinating. For special events — weddings, Bar Mitzvahs, High Holidays — Maxi has attained almost reverential status with its customers, who simply wouldn't dream of shopping elsewhere.

James and Hristina Bartzis, Maxi's founders, passed the torch to daughters Sandra and Elizabeth. The latter now searches the world over for key looks, then hand-picks them — often with a particular customer in mind.

Always a strong supporter of Canadian designers, Maxi offers the very best of Lida Baday, Crystal Siemens, Misura, David Dixon, Lino Catalano, and David Bitton. An American contingent includes Betsy Johnson, Parasuco, DKNY, and Laundry. The European market is represented by labels such as Folies Marcain, Tuzzi, Cambio, Ambiente, Sara Pacini, Teenflo, and Sinequanone.

Ms. Bartzis recently returned to Canada from London, England, where she spent three years as a buyer at prestigious Harrods. She is now using the knowledge gained from her international exposure to further enhance Maxi's already formidable designer collections.

Industry recognition

In 1997 a distinguished panel of judges voted Maxi Boutique "Toronto Fashion Retailer of the Year", over candidates that included every heavyweight in the industry. Maxi was also deemed "Best Little Shop In The Country" by Chatelaine (January 2001).

Though honoured, Bartzis says the critics who count most are the ones they serve daily: their customers. "Our clients have high expectations, and so do we," she smiles. "We wouldn't have it any other way."

Shopping at Maxi is not only an adventure in fashion; it's a chance to connect with kindred spirits. Observes Bartzis, "When customers tell you they value the experience even more than the merchandise, they're paying you the ultimate compliment."

If you've ever fancied yourself a mythical Greek beauty, a wonderfully stylish line of knitwear from Athens will get you one step closer to looking like one.

Long renowned in Greece for its elegance and quality construction, the Traverso line is now available in Toronto at 592 Danforth Avenue, across from Korry's. With its bleached oak floor, white-and-cream interior and antique trim, the shop provides a bright, sunny backdrop for this exquisitely-designed collection.

The line features predominately natural, breathable fibres in many classic styles, yet even the simplest pieces often feature some fanciful detailing that sets them apart from other popular knitwear lines. Sizes range from 4 to 14, and up to 16 for certain items. Prices are less than what you'd expect to pay for this level of quality — and, as of this writing, dramatically less due to an introductory special.

A wide range of colours, from soft, romantic pastels to rich earth tones, set the tone for every occasion and mood. Styles range from casual to formal, and there's a terrific selection of suits appropriate for the High Holidays.

592 Danforth Avenue

Further enhancing Traverso's appeal is its transitional quality: warm enough for spring and fall, yet cool enough for summer, most garments carry effortlessly from season to season. Their timeless elegance also means they'll never go out of style, and "they wear magnificently," says owner Tracy Stamp. "We stand behind our product unconditionally."

So, to achieve the look and bearing of an Athenian beauty, you no longer need to traverse the Atlantic; just visit 592 Danforth and experience Traverso first-hand. Once you've run these wondrous fibres through your fingers, you'll want to make them a permanent part of your wardrobe. They're beautiful, comfortable, and practical — and that's no Greek myth.

The name "Mezes" says something about culture as well as cuisine. It says a lot about the good life.

"Mezes" is the popular Greek light snack. Several Mezedes (plural) make a meal, usually shared by friends amid leisurely conversation. And Mezes' relaxed, friendly ambience does full justice to its namesake dish.

Some mezedes, says proprietor Sue Zindros, are always popular. For an exciting meal, pick a couple of old favourites, along with one or two items you haven't yet tried. It's like conversation with good friends: familiar thoughts, spiced with new ideas.

Sue says about half her guests order a staple plate with pita and several dips: Hoummous, Tzatziki, Taramosalata (fish roe), and Melitzanosalata (grilled puréed eggplant). On their own, these could comprise a light lunch; the textures and flavours of each dip complement each other in a symphony of flavours.

Mezes' Saganaki also keeps patrons coming back. Kefalograviera, an imported Greek hard cheese, is pan-fried, drizzled with brandy and flambéed, its now-tender centre enveloped in a crisp, golden brown crust. Just as the flame flares to alarming heights, it's cavalierly extinguished with a squirt of fresh lemon juice. This isn't just a dish, it's a performance — and nowhere is it executed with greater flair and better taste than at Mezes.

But appetizers aren't the only fare for which Mezes is renowned. Mainstream dishes like fried kalamari, shrimp, lamb chops, souvlaki, and moussaka (both beef and vegetarian) are consistently top-drawer, as are Greek specialties like Dolmades (ground beef and rice with fresh dill, wrapped in vine leaves), and Gigantes (giant lima beans baked in tomatoes with other vegetables and fresh dill).

The use of fresh herbs and spices has always been a Mezes trademark. "We know only one way to cook: the right way," says Sue. "We never cut corners."

One highly-recommended Mezes entrée is the Bifteki (baked ground beef stuffed with sautéed onions, peppers, kefalograviara and parmesan cheese). It evokes many of the best elements not only of Greek cuisine, but of European cuisine in general.

Mezes now caters, so its uncompromising quality can be enjoyed in your home or office too. But the Danforth is still home base: where better to enjoy your mezedes than at Mezes?

Sushi Delight lives up to its name

If you're a Japanese food lover who also loves the Danforth, Sushi Delight offers a wonderful taste of the rising sun in a bright, immaculate setting. The variety is spectacular, the prices extremely modest; and the namesake item (tasty morsels of uncooked fish on delicious beds of rice) will serenade your taste buds as few other delicacies can.

Complete meals, in a Bento box and served with soup, salad, rice and dessert, range from $6.95 for the Vegetarian Box, which includes tempura, to $11.95 for the Tokyo Box, which includes sushi.

Equally tasty are the large selection of sashimi (morsels of seafood or meat) and makimono (seaweed or rice rolls, with a seafood or vegetable core).

Sushi Delight uses only the freshest ingredients, and is 100% MSG-free. Every bite fulfills the needs of good health as well as the desire for good taste.

Service is friendly and cheerful, and children are welcome. The bright, uplifting setting maintains the aura of delicacy seemingly intrinsic to Japanese culture. The dishes, in their great variety, are as attractive to the eye as to the palate.

Sushi Delight is further evidence of the Danforth's diverse international flavour, and well worth a visit by anyone wishing to explore Japanese cuisine or further their existing love affair with it.

Kit Kat sends fashion spirits soaring

In what surely qualifies as Toronto's most uplifting basement, the brand new Kit Kat Clothing Co. epitomizes the Danforth's growing reputation as a fun fashion destination.

Walk down just a few steps — enough to work off your first bite of souvlaki — and you'll discover a funky little treasure chest of brand-name fashion bargains. Dex, Point Zero, Powerline, and a host of other famous labels — many at unmentionably low prices — beckon from every nook and cranny of this charming little enclave.

White-and-yellow walls, exposed brick, and a general lack of symmetry merely add to the shop's cachet and sunny disposition, as does the purringly friendly personal service. In short, it's everything a basement usually isn't.

Whether you're 18 or 80, if you like ladies' fashion, you'll find something to love at Kit Kat. Tops start at $15, dresses at $29. Most pieces are under $100. Sizes generally go up to 20, and all physiques are accommodated, from slim to full-figured. A marvellous grouping of summer dresses is worth the visit alone.

The focus is on upbeat, casual sportswear, but you'll also find an amazing variety of accessories and costume jewellery, also at terrific prices.

Despite their relatively tender ages, partners Dov Elmaleh and Heidi Preuss have more than 20 years' combined experience in the fashion business. After successful stints at Yonge and Eglinton and Queen's Quay, they jumped at the chance to relocate Kit Kat in the heart of GreekTown. "The area just feels right," grins Dov. "It's upbeat, it's down to earth, the restaurants are wonderful — and we're right in the middle of it."

The name Kit Kat suggests something cool, sleek, fun, and cute. This Kit Kat is all of that and then some. So next time you're on the Danforth, go down a few steps at #412, and feel your fashion spirits soar.

Healthy choices at expanded Big Carrot

From humble beginnings in 1983, The Big Carrot has grown into metropolitan Toronto's largest health food store and wholistic dispensary. A recent major expansion means there's even more of The Big Carrot to nurture your health.

Run as a worker owned co-op since its opening, The Big Carrot caters to a loyal clientele that embraces both its ethos and its products: minimally processed, organically grown, cruelty free, environmentally safe and, increasingly, GMO-free. As it happens, many of these products are also Kosher.

Health-conscious customers seek out The Big Carrot for its extensive organic fruit and vegetable department (over 100 varieties at peak season) and its unmatched selection of organic bulk foods, dairy products, frozen foods, and packaged goods. Its extensive body care department boasts Canada's widest selection of personal care products for the entire family, including baby.

While most health food stores carry a few brands of a particular item, The Big Carrot often has half a dozen or more, and their well-versed staff is more than happy to help you decide which products will suit your dietary needs and your palate. If it's wheat-free — if it's dairy-free — if it's simply good for you, The Big Carrot undoubtedly has it.

The vast product selection includes a staggering variety of breads, buns, fresh-daily brick-oven bagels, flatbreads, and bread sticks — many of them wheat-free and dairy-free.

The Big Carrot has by far Toronto's largest selection of soy milks and other non-dairy beverages, both fresh and tetra pack. Ditto for wholesome natural cookies, muffins, and other baked goods.

Among many others, the Kosher products include Crofters Organic Premium Fruit Spreads from Ontario; Woodstock Organics Frozen Soups; Imagine Foods Tetra Pack Dairy-Free Soups (the ultimate in convenience); Nature's Path Organic Cereals; My Zaidy's Breads; Organic Meadow Yogurts & Pressed Cheese; Jersey Farm Non-Dairy Soy Yogurt; Barbara's Fig Bars; Mrs. Denson's Wheat-Free Cookies; Sweet Nothings & Soy Delicious Non-Dairy Frozen Desserts; Michael Season's Potato Chips; Guiltless Gourmet Corn Chips; Suzie's Soy Chips; and selected products from Eden Foods.

The Big Carrot's Wholistic Dispensary, located across the courtyard, constitutes a store in its own right. Among other Kosher products, it carries Omega Flax Seed Oil, selected Solgar Supplements and Tofupill from Israel.

Through its continuing expansion, The Big Carrot has retained the humility and friendliness of its early years. This is a store that's down to earth in every possible sense, and a real pleasure to visit.

Konis culinary legacy continues at Octavia

For 15 years at Memories — and, for the past four, at Octavia — Tom Konis has given his legion of supporters ample reason to smile, and many fine meals to remember. Octavia's Mediterranean / Continental fusion showcases his exceptional culinary skills and range. There is no gimmickry here — just wonderful food that bears his signature as clearly as if he attached a handwritten note to each dish.

New, fresh approaches to traditional dishes are part and parcel of the Konis legacy. Never one to rest on his laurels, Tom makes old favourites new ones by adding twists and nuances as his inspiration dictates.

One example: the Poppyseed Grilled Salmon in a Lemon Butter Garlic Reduction. Another: the Peccorina Pizza with roasted red peppers, onions, wild mushrooms, soft ripened goat cheese and lamb rosemary sausage.

If steak is your pleasure, Tom's New York U.S. prime, grilled to perfection and served in a Brandy Peppercorn sauce, sets a standard unparalleled on the Danforth. Indeed, it surpasses that of some well-known steak houses — at a lower price!

Octavia's greatly expanded wine list now features over 40 fine vintages to accompany your meal.

After dinner, Octavia puts on its lounge hat and serves up some of Toronto's finest martinis. Dessert martinis are a specialty; among others, the Espresso Martini will put an exclamation point on your evening. And, unlike some establishments which merely encourage you to relax after dinner, Octavia's built for relaxation. Its intimate, plush semicircular booths — recently reupholstered in fine leather — evoke a Roaring Twenties elegance.

With partner Tom Athanasopoulos, son John Konis and a caring staff, Tom has made Octavia a prime dining destination. The Octavia difference, so apparent in the cuisine, is also exemplified by the warm greeting you'll receive from John Konis when you enter. This is a family business in the best sense of the term; the Konises and their staff don't merely work the business, they live it. The spirit of service is ever-present; the singular focus of John and other members of the Octavia team is to ensure that both your meal and your visit are memorable.

Notwithstanding Octavia's soaring popularity, Tom Konis pledges never to lose sight of his commitment to customer satisfaction. "It's not how many customers you serve, it's how well you serve the customers you have."

Danforth wireless dealer puts service, safety first

In today's wired world, it's nice to know there's one dealership out there that's well-grounded in service and safety. Tri-Cell Communications makes it easy for its customers to buy a cell phone or pager from them by going the extra mile in terms of personal service and technical assistance.

Josh Mudrick
Corporate Account Executive

Josh Mudrick, Corporate Account Executive at the Rogers AT& T dealership at 272 Danforth Avenue, has made three important elements the cornerstones of his business: "Service, service, and more service," he says. "We carry the same products you'll find at most other dealerships, at essentially the same prices. But we take the time to make sure you understand what you're buying, and we do whatever it take to satisfy you."

Hands-free specialist

To that end, Tri-Cell carries a wide range of accessories, with the emphasis on hands-free operation to ensure your safety on occasions when you need to talk as you drive. Tri-Cell carries a wide range of headsets, and has the expertise to outfit you with the right one for your mobile needs.

Tri-Cell is an authorized Nokia service centre and has repair facilities on site.

So when you're on the Danforth, drop in to Tri-Cell at # 272 (west of Chester) and experience the ultimate in wireless service.

La Vespa Café scintillating & summery

If a restaurant can be defined by the quality of its beverages, then La Vespa has achieved star status. Specializing in exotic drinks, La Vespa features the most spectacular Sangria this side of Shangri-La. A larger-than-life serving of fresh fruit juice, brimming with exotic freshly-cut fruit, generously infused with premium red wine, and beautifully garnished, it puts other "comparable" Toronto offerings to shame. An ideal summer thirst-quencher, this taste of the tropics relaxes and refreshes at one and the same time. Another delight is the Tropical Coconut Blast — a half baby coconut served open-faced with a mixture of rum and its own fresh coconut milk.

Complementing it are a host of other summer beverages. Particularly popular are the frozen cocktails, highlighted by a fine Chocolate Pina Colada, Caribbean Fruit, Sea Breeze, and Strawberry Daiquiri.

La Vespa has elements of a sports bar, but it's much more. In addition to its oversized TV screens and billiard tables, it also features elegant bench seating, a huge, sunny patio, and an extensive menu that goes far beyond standard bar fare.

An abundance of fresh summer salads include Baby Organic Greens (Grilled Bell Peppers and Artichokes with Herbed Goat Cheese in Balsamic Dressing, $7.95); and Baby Spinach with Gruyère Cheese, Portobello Mushrooms & Onions in a Citrus Vinaigrette, also $7.95. The entrées are hearty yet artfully prepared. A Breakfast Brunch is served Saturday and Sunday.

La Vespa
535 Danforth Avenue 416•778•7565

La Vespa features regular theme nights, such as Karaoke (on Tuesday, with one of Toronto's top DeeJays); All-You-Can-Eat Mussels (Wednesday) and Top 40 (Saturday). There are live bands on Thursday.

Serious Karaoke

La Vespa has become a Karaoke destination of sorts; its Karaoke Tuesday now draws serious singers from all over the city. If your vocal chords are in good working order and you want to exercise them in a quasi-professional environment, La Vespa will resonate with you.

If you enjoy great food, have a yen for sports, can belt out a tune, or simpy wish to relax and enjoy some sunny Danforth moments, you have a vested interest in checking out La Vespa Café.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

If Jane Hall be the voice of colour, sing on!

Remember the first time you saw a peacock feather, and how it thrilled you with wonder and joy? A visit to Jane Hall The Voice of Colour arouses those same emotions.

This renowned artist has teamed up with Pittsburgh Paints to bring her signature style to a new store on the Danforth, which takes clients on a unique home decor adventure.

The stunning European-style showroom offers an exclusive home collection of artwork, custom painted and upholstered furniture, plus bedding, throws, cushions, area rugs, and 225 colours of paint. Each of six room vignettes evokes a different mood with inspired colour combinations.

In fact, to call this a "showroom" is to somehow diminish it, for it has the aura and feel of a highly personal space. Hall and partner Ian Levack don't tell you how colours work, they show you. The visual feast — a glorious palette of mustard, fuschia, avocado, yellow gold, burnt orange, and other breathtaking hues — demonstrate a quasi-spiritual connection with colour. The custom-painted fabric which upholsters Hall's chairs and spans her elegant wrought-iron screens is but one example.

Jane Hall

707 Pape at Danforth
(416) 462-2949

After years of designing fabric and painting murals — including many for the Second Cup chain — Hall was moved to do her own paintings and custom furniture. Levack creates and designs home furnishing products on a licensing basis; among others, he designed the first Royal Doulton licensing program for home furnishings.

The store's dramatic room vignettes were created by Zerick Garner, the third member of the team, who has worked for 35 years in eclectic areas of the design and decor world.

Jane Hall is one of only a handful of North American retailers carrying the whimsical Solo line of upscale furniture. Created by Toronto-area craftsman Joe Salerno, these custom high-quality sofas and chairs, with their strong hues and curving lines, are a perfect complement to Hall's fearless approach to colour.

You won't find any paint cans on the floor; customers order the paint, which is delivered to their homes. In-store consulting, home visits, and a contracting service are all part of the Jane Hall experience.

The buzz of excitement that's surrounded the store since its opening continues unabated. One visit explains why; your eyes will thank you.

Retirees also need investment growth

Unfortunately, no two retirees are the same. Everyone has a different cost of living, different levels of retirement income, and different personal or health issues that should be considered when making investment decisions. There are, however, some important things to keep in mind.

The average 65-year old retiree can expect to live another 15 years. Even with low or modest inflation, the cost of living will rise during that time. This reality should encourage you to do two things financially.

First, retirees should invest a part of their savings in investments that have rising income and the potential for growth. Growth of principal and rising income will be essential to maintaining a constant standard of living over a 10- to 20-year retirement.

Second, retirees should reinvest part of their income, if possible. This may involve:

- reinvesting the dividends in a stock or mutual fund;
- reinvesting interest into a GIC;
- postponing withdrawals from an RRSP; or
- investing your monthly Old Age Security cheque.

This plan of action provides you with a safety valve of income that you can "turn on" at some point in the future if you incur unexpected costs or if the cost of living slowly diminishes your standard of living.

The last recommendation is to stay diversified. No one investment is perfect for all of your money. Diversification can help you improve your investment returns over time and minimize the possibility of a total collapse in your investment holdings.

Functional fashion, gear for hectic lifestyles at Destination Danforth

Life isn't always simple. So when you put on long pants, jump in the car and realize you need shorts, you can do one of two things. Chalk it up to your personal neurosis — or go to Destination Danforth and pick up a garment that serves as both.

Functionality is the name of the game at this ultracool shop. Long pants that zip off to become shorts. Shorts that become long pants. Jackets that fold up to fit into a zip pocket. Quick-dry shirts. Pre-shrunk stuff that you can tuck into a side pocket. Rainwear. Reflective gear. Cool mesh wear. Bug jackets and pants for summer. Polar fleece pajamas and sleeping bags for winter. Gear and gadgets for every situation.

Destination Danforth carries a large selection of quality lines, including Columbia, Hempwear, Mac & Jac, Misty Mountain, Elita, Mod Robes, Rockwater Design, Love Letters, and others. With steady turnover and new stock arriving daily, their prices are consistently 20% to 30% lower than the competition's, says owner Sarah Fishman. "Our customer is anyone who wants to get the most out of any situation without fuss and baggage — and we save them money to boot."

Hemp, cotton in abundance

Catering extensively to the film and travel trades, Destination Danforth is a boon to men and women on the move who need to change, Bond-like, without losing a beat and without sacrificing comfort. According to Fishman, many customers also value the health benefits which derive from natural fibres and/or space-age construction. "Many items in the store are anti-microbial and don't absorb odour," she notes. Likewise, many are designed to retain body heat in winter and wick away perspiration in summer; a terrific selection of fleece socks will allow you to enjoy the ultimate in foot comfort year-round. The shop carries a multitude of sturdy cotton garments that are extremely breathable and non-itchy. Hemp is huge now, and Destination Danforth has an extensive selection of hemp shirts, pants — both long and short — and T-shirts.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Pantheon will have you singing praises

Of all the restaurants in GreekTown, Pantheon's decor is perhaps the most inviting. The creamy white tile floor etched with gold is soothing, yet refined; the walls, alive with colourful murals, are capped with finely etched wooden trim; the tables, bedecked with crisp linens in white and gold, are flanked by real wooden chairs.

Given such a backdrop, anything less than a superb culinary experience would be a letdown. Thankfully, Pantheon lives up to its exalted name.

Though its mainstream Greek cuisine compares favourably with that of other Danforth restaurants, fresh fish is what keeps Pantheon's loyal following coming back in droves. Whole sea bass, striped bass, red and white snapper, orange roughy, black porgy, salmon, red mullet, sea smelts — the variety is incredible, the preparation impeccable. As the Toronto Star noted, "Above all, small fish imported from Greece, such as anchovies and baby sardines . . . demand repeat visits. This [lovely fish] is what sets Pantheon apart from most Toronto Greek restaurants."

" ... a winning charm ..."

— The Toronto Star, May 13, 2000

Chef Nick Paroussis — who, with partner John Troupis, is responsible for maintaining these lofty standards — clearly understands that the best way to bring out the intrinsic flavour of fresh fish is to neither overcook it nor cover it up.

This delicate treatment extends to the fresh Ontario lamb chops, which can be enjoyed on their own or as part of a substantial mixed grill.

Mouthwatering homemade desserts provide a fitting conclusion to your meal. In addition to the traditional baklava, you'll find Pantheon's walnut cake particularly enticing, and its honey cake will no doubt give rise to endless comparisons with you-know-who's.

You'd expect to pay a premium for such superb cuisine, but Pantheon's prices are actually below average for the Danforth. When you combine this with the aforementioned ambience, you're talking exceptional value for GreekTown.

Exotic delights at Sher-E-Punjab

The soulful strains of the sitar greet you as you enter. The deep, rich earth tones of Indian slate tile — reddish brown, copper, a hint of gold — are at once exotic and peaceful. Magnificent tapestries, hand-woven in Rajasthan, adorn the butternut-yellow walls.

You're not even seated yet, and already you've begun to experience the tranquility that is Sher-E-Punjab.

SHER-E-PUNJAB RESTAURANT
351 Danforth Avenue
416-465-2125

For Amar and Malkit Singh, this is more than a restaurant; it's the place where they've lovingly served Northern Indian home cooking for the past 27 years. In the process, they've not only shared wonderful flavours, but also touched patrons with their gentle demeanor and quiet dignity.

Connoisseurs of Punjabi specialties have known about Sher-E for decades, but with its major renovation six years ago and the growing popularity of Northern Indian cuisine, a much larger dining public has come to know and savour its diverse delights.

Widely reputed for its Butter Chicken, Chicken Tikka Masala, Pakoras and Samosas, Sher-E holds the distinction of making Toronto's finest Naan bread — a soft, oval loaf that's best served hot. But be forewarned: it's addictive! Hand-made on the premises, it is baked fresh virtually on demand — every 15 minutes or so, at busy times — and delivered piping hot to your table. The experience of seeing it emerge from the massive Tandoori clay oven is surpassed only by the pleasure of eating it.

This, truly, is manna from heaven.

Saag — a pureed mixture of spinach, broccoli, and rapini — is another dish prized by Sher-E's customers for its unique combination of sharp and mellow tastes. The ever-popular Daal (pureed lentils) and Bartha — barbequed eggplant with green peas — are also first-rate.

If you can put down the Naan bread long enough to order dessert, try the refreshing Kulfi (Indian ice cream). Indian Tea – strong, sweet, and mildly spiced — is a piquant complement to any meal or dessert.

Those unfamiliar with Northern Indian cuisine tend to associate it only with curry. To be sure, you'll enjoy fine curried dishes here, made from scratch with the freshest, hand-blended spices; but this is only a very small part of the culinary picture. Sher-E-Punjab completes the tableau with elegance and grace, and with the kind of personal attention, respect and warmth that's only found in a long-established family business.

Nowhere is the multicultural appeal of the Danforth better exemplified than at Sher-E-Punjab, and those who visit it are in for a richly rewarding experience.

Ice cream heaven at Uncle Louie G's

Remember, from your childhood, the inimitable taste of ice cream, and how it thrilled you with pleasure? Uncle Louie G's revives that taste sensation. This Danforth parlour represents everything ice cream should be: made the old-fashioned way, without additives or preservatives, packed with pure natural flavour — and it's Kosher-manufactured under KOF-K.

Its Brooklyn, N.Y. creator, John Russo, also credits the generous use of key ingredients for his product's success: "We got this popular because we decided to use twice as many chips, nuts, berries, cream as anyone else, and still sell at a reasonable ... price." [New York Daily News].

Uncle Louie G's natural ices and ice creams come in a cavalcade of 60 flavours — always in store — many of which seem to emanate from your own personal food fantasies. For example, there's Apple Pie and Pumpkin Pie Ice Cream, made with real chunks of fresh pie. Ditto for Strawberry Cheesecake and Pineapple Cheesecake Ice Cream. For real Italian flavour, there's Tortoni Ice Cream and Dulche Ice Cream, made with scalded milk. Ices? Try the Mango or the Honeydew Melon for a refreshing summer treat.

In addition to their current variety of ices, ice creams and milkshakes, Uncle Louie G's offers ice cream cakes, hot waffles, and other gourmet items including nut-free Kosher Chocolates by Chocolate Signatures, to be enjoyed in store or out. Custom cakes for all occasions, made in house from the purest ingredients, are a speciality.

Custom cakes a specialty

If your child has a favourite cartoon, the shop can probably make a theme cake for it. Popular orders include Sesame Street, Barbie, Mickey Mouse, Winnie the Pooh, Bug's Life, Toy Story 2, Rugrats, Cinderella, Thomas & Friends, Looney Tunes, Spider-Man, and many more.

From floor to ceiling, the shop is gleefully awash in bright pastel colours — yellow, green, blue, and pink — and brimming with goodies. It's a great place to relive your childhood innocence with favourite old flavours and a bevy of intriguing new ones.

MIHANA
SUSHI & KOREAN RESTAURANT
507 Danforth Ave.
(416) 465-3834

Drawing on her 30 years of experience and twofold Oriental influences, Mrs. Kim brings to the kitchen a rare mastery of the fine art of Far Eastern cuisine. Sous-chef James — also with extensive international experience — is the latest in a long line of distinguished chefs going back four generations.

Foremost among Mihana's Korean specialties is Galbi — marinated Korean Prime Short Ribs. These are offered in three different ways:

- on a sizzling plate, served with rice, vegetables, soup, and salad on the side;
- in a heated stone dish, served with vegetables on a bed of rice (also available with chicken or seafood instead of beef);
- in a lunch box with rice, vegetables, salad, and tempura shrimp.

Also highly recommended are the Crispy Chicken and Crispy Beef, Korean style. Here, they're done just right: delicately crunchy on the outside, tender on the inside, sweet and sour sauce not overstated.

Mihana's Noodles in Soup are sharp, hearty and satisfying.

The sushi selection includes a tantalizing variety of rolls. The Soft Shell Crab with White Tuna and the Tempura Shrimp with Spicy Tuna, both in Mihana's special sauce, are particularly flavourful. Mihana's miso sauce (made from Japanese bean paste) is a welcome enhancement to many of the rolls.

As befits its name, Mihana is a small, intimate place. While it might seem daunting for an establishment of this size to offer two distinctly different kinds of cuisine, James doesn't view it that way. The breadth and scope of his mother's expertise is such that she's really "two chefs in one," he says. It also gives customers an opportunity to sample both types of cuisine in one meal. "Here it is possible to go to a sushi bar and a Korean restaurant under one roof," he chuckles.

At Mihana, this feat is accomplished with delicious results — and without double parking.

Winnipeg Jews remember Argentinian tragedy

By MARTIN ZEILIG
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Remembering the tragic events of seven years ago has become a personal mission for Gustavo Rymberg.

At 9:53 a.m. on Monday, July 18, 1994, a terrorist bomb exploded in the AMIA Jewish Community Centre in Buenos Aires, Argentina. Eighty six individuals were killed and 300 were wounded in the blast.

According to information from B'nai B'rith Canada, the attack is believed to have been carried out by the Iranian-backed Hezbollah terrorist group with assistance from Argentine police and security officials.

To date, no one has been brought to justice for that crime or for the bombing of the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires in 1992. That explosion resulted in 29 deaths and 252 injured.

"My personal goal is to help keep the memory (of the AMIA explosion) alive and to make other people aware of this," said Rymberg, 34, a graphic designer at the Asper Jewish Community Campus, who moved to Winnipeg from Buenos Aires with his wife and two children four years ago.

An AMIA commemorative service attended by over 50 people was held at the Asper Campus on July 18 at precisely 9:53 a.m. The event was organized by the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal along with B'nai Brith Canada's Institute for International Affairs.

Rymberg prepared a photo display, and spliced together from other documentary footage a moving eight-minute video dealing with the aftermath of the destruction. He also read the names of the 86 individuals killed in the blast. The victims ranged in age from five to 73 years.

Shelley Faintuch, a spokesperson for the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, stressed that senseless acts of terrorism can't be allowed to go unpunished forever.

"It's very important to do something as a community to connect us with Jews around the world through keeping this [memory of the explosion] alive. This is an act of solidarity with the Argentine Jewish community," she said, adding that some 20 families have moved to Winnipeg from Argentina over the last six years.

'An act of solidarity'

At the time of the bombing, Rymberg was working in his office several blocks away from the AMIA building.

"Suddenly, you heard the explosion," recalled Rymberg, adding that he knew some of the people, although none were close friends, who were killed in the explosion.

"You expected a bomb because of the previous explosion two years before. It was like a war scene, traffic immediately stopped, other buildings were damaged for blocks around. People who were walking on the street [near the explosion] or sitting in coffee shops across the street were killed too."

The tragedy is also seared into the memory of a Winnipeg woman. Her closest friend Paola, who was just 21, died in the explosion. The 28-year-old woman would only consent to an interview with this reporter if her name was not used.

"Paola was on winter vacation from university," said the woman, who moved here with her husband in September 1997.

"Her mother worked there and had asked her if she could help her with something at the AMIA. A few minutes prior to the explosion she went down to the main level for a coffee. At that moment the explosion happened and she probably died instantly. But we didn't know she was dead until Thursday when they found her body. Her mother survived the bombing. It marks you for life. You're aware of it. The next time it could be you."

Both the woman and Rymberg acknowledged that they immigrated to Canada, in part, because of the bombing.

"After that bomb a lot of things started to change for the Jewish community. There were extra security for Jewish buildings and at synagogues. Children had to show their knapsacks [to security guards]. It was really hard," said Rymberg, adding that three days after the explosion several hundred thousand people participated in a rally in Buenos Aires in support of the Jewish community.

Few Jewish staffers on the Hill

In an effort to present a cautionary note to the Jewish community, your faithful scribe offers an admittedly, politically incorrect observation. Take it in the spirit it is intended.

Once upon a time, the Hill was populated by scores of Jewish staffers. I can remember a time when the traditional staff Christmas parties of more than one caucus would display token Chanukah lights in a nod to their Jewish colleagues. Alas, that seems long ago.

Today, one has to look very carefully to discover a ministerial assistant or MP staffer who identifies actively as a Jew. That should be of some concern to the Jewish community.

Gone are the days when the community could feel reassured that the likes of a Bob Rabinovitch (Pierre Trudeau's chief of staff) or Stanley Hart, Norman Spector and Hughie Seigel (who all held the same position under Brian Mulroney) would ensure some level of access. Of course, that is not to say that such individuals served as toadies for the community; only that they possessed a unique sensitivity to specifically Jewish concerns and could provide a fair hearing.

The Chaviva Hoseks (advisor to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien) and the Mark Resnicks (advisor to John Turner and earnest supporter of Paul Martin) have abandoned the Hill for more attractive pursuits; even legendary Gerry Yanover (who has worked for every Liberal!) is rumoured to be heading off, too.

Worse yet, the few younger Jewish aspirants who have tried to make some mark on the political scene over the last while, fall short of the mark. There's the case of Ezra Levant who was chased out of Manning's office by erstwhile colleagues whom he made uncomfortable. He resurrected himself as a mini-saviour to Stockwell Day only to find himself on the street a short time later.

Take the case of Boris Wajsman, who barrelled back into politics after an inexplicable absence as Irwin Cotler's executive assistant. He then joined the Gagliano team. Now we discover that Gagliano is seriously contemplating a speedy exit and that will leave Wajsman, well, in about the same place as Levant.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

The complacency within the Jewish community that has resulted in an absence of any real presence within any party is mirrored on the Hill, and it could cost the community dearly.

Not being one to criticize without offering a solution, here's more unsolicited advice.

Get your kids on the Hill. Encourage them to participate in internship programs or create one of your own. And most important of all, face the truth: the indifference of Jewish youth to consider opportunities within the political sector is nothing more than a reflection of the community's apparent disdain for actively participating in the democratic process.

To be sure, the community's interests are compromised by the lack of a visible Jewish presence. But in a very real sense, the whole country is poorer for the absence of a more dynamic Jewish conscience in Ottawa.

Troubling times in Kitchener-Waterloo

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There is a relative calm these days in Kitchener-Waterloo, Ont., but below the surface, some members of the community are saying that the twin cities are passing through disturbing times.

The Jewish and German communities are definitely divided over the recent treatment of Helmut Oberlander and by MP Andrew Telegdi's position on this issue, said Paul Walman, vice-chair of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region.

After the Federal Court of Canada found that Oberlander failed to disclose his role as an interpreter with a Nazi death squad, Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan promised to recommend to cabinet that Oberlander's citizenship be revoked as a first step towards deportation.

In support of Oberlander, Telegdi stated that Canada's rules on deportation were reminiscent of Hitler and a totalitarian Nazi or Stalinist regime.

CJC called for Telegdi's resignation, and a flurry of letters supporting Telegdi and Oberlander then appeared in the Kitchener-Waterloo Record.

"The language in the Record has been quite unpleasant," Walman said, "with name calling and personal attacks."

The situation here became very uncomfortable, said Manya Kay, a Holocaust survivor who lost her family in the concentration camp at Birkenau.

"Things are quiet now," Kay said. "Yet only a few months ago, a day didn't pass without unpleasant letters appearing in the newspapers."

Kitchener, a city known as Berlin until World War I, was settled mainly by German-speaking immigrants in the mid-19th century. The city's annual Oktoberfest is a celebration of its Bavarian heritage.

The Jewish community began to settle in Kitchener around the turn of the century.

"In the past, the relationship between the Jewish and German communities was very good," said Ernst Friedel, president of the German Canadian Congress.

Today, however, there is definitely a change in relations between the two communities, Friedel noted.

"Unfortunately, we cannot agree with Canadian Jewish Congress on their position regarding Oberlander," he said.

CJC is asking that Oberlander be deported for misrepresenting his background during the war when applying to immigrate to Canada.

What has happened is that "some people are now blaming the Jewish people for the tension," Friedel said.

"I believe that both sides are saddened by the events and wish it were behind them."

"All of this brings back bad memories, and right now I'm scared... It reminds me of the days I lived through hell," said Kay.

"I love it here in Kitchener," she continued, "but right now I feel that the politicians here are catering only to the wishes of the German community since they represent the majority."

The importance of being Shylock cheering the punishment of the selfish... evil father... I actually witnessed one gentleman weeping tears of sorrow."

The letter indicates that Shylock's character is complicated and that it is important for the audience to re-examine all the roles in The Merchant, Soles said. One of the important messages in the play is that all that glitters is not gold – things are not as they appear.

Soles credits the support and resources available in Stratford with allowing him to bring his interpretation to Shylock to the stage. In addition, Soles said, "at no time did Richard [Monette], the director of the play, impose any alteration to what I brought to the part.

"I'm hoping that because I brought such honesty to the play, he found little to alter."

With regard to the recent controversy involving the Council on American-Islamic Relations Canada's complaints about the depiction of the Prince of Morocco, Soles said that he feels absolutely comfortable with the negotiations and the subsequent modifications to the play.

"There have been some minor changes [in the character's presentation]. But what has happened is that the community has been responded to in an amicable and respectful way."

There was an open, intelligent and mature dialogue and response to an artistic endeavour in keeping with who we are in 2001, Soles said.

Had members of any other community complained, Soles believes that the issues would have been dealt with in a similar way.

"Shakespeare is full of blows to various ethnicities and if any community rises up, the festival listens and [the complaints] are dealt with."

However, it is important not to compromise the artistic integrity of a production, he added. In some cases, "politically correct arguments are pettier than the attention they deserve."

Despite the controversies, Soles believes the play should never be shelved nor the issues "dumbed down."

"If the audience leaves the play involved in self-analysis, then we've fulfilled all good reasons for a theatre."

Given the complexity and magnificence of the writing, Soles doesn't recommend it to students before Grade 12.

"The play requires good and honest preparation. Otherwise, it wouldn't be fair to the students or to the community at large."

The current production of The Merchant of Venice, in Stratford until Nov. 3, is dedicated to Al Waxman, who was scheduled to play Shylock before his sudden death earlier this year.

Given the similarities in our backgrounds, said Soles, who was born and raised in Toronto, "I believe that Al would have also approached the text respectful of the incredible responsibility involved."

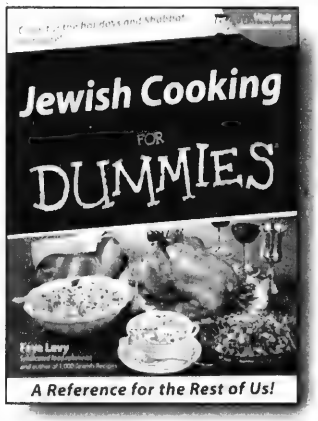
Faye Levy makes Jewish cooking easy

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Jewish people love to cook for the holidays, says Faye Levy, internationally renowned cooking authority and author of over 20 cookbooks.

"Fortunately we have one every week – Shabbat!"

For those of us wondering what the award-winning author of the encyclopedic 1,000 Jewish Recipes could possibly come up with next, comes Levy's Jewish Cooking for Dummies, a lighthearted, abundantly accessible, information-packed primer on Jewish food, culture and celebration, with tips from her tool belt on everything from handling jalapenos to quartering a whole chicken.



"It's more than an introduction to Jewish cooking, but to Jewish celebrating too," says Levy, who begins with a short history of Jewish food, demystifies the laws of kashrut and explains the customs and foods of the holidays.

"Shabbat is such a joyous holiday," she says. "It's a celebration every week to look forward to. For observant families it is the high point of the week. If you have a new dress, you set it aside for Shabbat. In fact, your whole schedule is directed towards Shabbat."

Instead of overwhelming you with the Thou Shalt Not's of Shabbat observance, The Shabbat chapter (subtitle: A Weekly Excuse to Rejoice) stresses the joy of this weekly celebration, proving in Levy's clear and concise style that with a little planning, even the most intimidated cook can serve a beautiful and festive Shabbat meal.

"Lots of people want to celebrate with Jewish food but don't know how," notes Levy, "converts, non-Jews married to Jews, even those who grew up Jewish but never had the traditional foods."

Take challah, for instance. Did you know you could knead the dough in a food processor or mixer? "If you've ever braided hair, forming a braided challah will be a snap," Levy assures us. And even if you can't braid, she offers a quick loaf pan alternative.

Levy grew up in Washington D.C. in an Orthodox home. "My favourite Shabbat food was my mother's noodle kugel, which sometimes she made sweet with apples and cinnamon and sometimes savoury with well-browned onions and mushrooms," recalls the California author. "I always loved the crunchy part of the noodles sticking up and would go back to the kitchen to pick them out."

For Jewish Cooking For Dummies Levy draws on her 30 years of cooking experience, which began when she was a young bride living in Israel. Although she had watched her mother bake her Shabbat cakes ("mainly so I could lick the bowl"), she never paid much attention.

Enter her husband, Yakir. "When I met my future mother-in-law, she told me I couldn't marry her son because he'd go hungry! Here was a woman who could make pita from the age of six. I had to learn fast."

And where better to learn than in Israel, home to so many cultures.

"Israel is not just a melting pot," says Levy, "it's a melting pressure cooker. It's a small, crowded country, and people from widely diverse cultures are always cooking for Shabbat or other holidays and sharing ideas."

This mix of cultures has created a sort of Israeli "Jewish fusion" cooking that is constantly evolving. "But it' not like fusion cooking here where a chef says, 'Now, how can I be creative? Let's put ginger in a French cream sauce.' In Israel it's completely natural. Friends and relatives from different cultures eat at each other's homes and say, That tastes good. What did you put in it?'"

Take the matzah ball, the beloved soup dumpling of Levy's Polish ancestors. Her mother, who has lived in Israel for 30 years, now adds the cumin and cilantro of her Sephardi neighbours.

To meet her mother is to understand where Levy gets her energy and enthusiasm. Pauline Kahn Luria lives in a fourth floor walk-up ("it's 56 steps, but I enjoy it!") loves to dance, and treks each day up a steep hill to downtown Jerusalem to shop or enjoy the sights and smells of Machaneh-Yehudah, the city's colourful open market. And she still bakes her cakes every Shabbat, even if she happens to be dining alone.

"Whenever we're together, whether I'm visiting her in Israel or she is here, we cook the Shabbat meal together, either the traditional Polish favourites I remember from childhood or the Mediterranean dishes we've both learned along the way," says Levy.

On the table, as in the streets of Israel, East meets West, and our Shabbat menu includes Levy's Mediterranean Baked Chicken and Chickpeas. Levy's motto: "Have fun and be confident."

BAKED CHICKEN AND CHICKPEAS IN GARLIC TOMATO SAUCE

This easy dish features Mediterranean flavours, which were originally particular to the Sephardi style. Now, they are universally loved by Jews everywhere.

Preparation time: 20 minutes
Cooking time: 1 hour, 10 minutes

2½ lb. chicken pieces
1 tsp. paprika
2 tbsp. plus 1 or 2 tsp. olive oil
1 large onion, chopped
1 carrot, diced
1 celery stalk, diced
4 large garlic cloves chopped
1 28 oz. can whole tomatoes, drained and chopped
1 bay leaf
¼ tsp. hot red pepper flakes, or cayenne to taste
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
4 tbsp. chopped cilantro or Italian parsley
15 oz. can chickpeas, drained and rinsed.

Preheat oven to 425. Sprinkle chicken with paprika on both sides. Put it in a 13 x 9 in. or other shallow baking dish on one layer. Drizzle chicken lightly with olive oil, using 1 or 2 tsp. Bake uncovered for 10 minutes. Turn pieces over and bake 7 more minutes to brown lightly. Reduce oven temperature to 375.

Meanwhile, heat remaining 2 tbsp. oil in a large skillet. Add onion, carrot, and celery and cook over medium-low heat about 7 minutes, or until onion softens. Stir in garlic, then tomatoes, bay leaf, pepper flakes, salt and pepper. Cook over medium heat, stirring often about 10 minutes or until thick. Discard bay leaf. Add 2 tbsp. cilantro. Yield: 4 servings.

Israel chooses discreet talks on UN video

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel has decided to hold discreet negotiations with the United Nations regarding the videorecording of the scene where Hezbollah abducted three IDF soldiers in Har Dov, senior Israeli officials say. This will end the acrimonious public exchanges in the affair.

The decision was reached Sunday in a meeting between the deputy director of the Defence Ministry, Moshe Kohanovsky, and other senior officials of his ministry and of the foreign ministry.

It was also agreed that direct communications on the matter with UN Secretary General Kofi Annan will be handled by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

Currently, the world body is carrying an internal investigation regarding the existence of a videorecording, which soldiers belonging to the Indian battalion of UNIFIL (UN Interim Force in Lebanon) took on October 9, 2000, a day after the Hezbollah attack against an IDF patrol inside Israel. The existence of the tape was kept from the UN representatives in the Middle East, headed by under-secretary Terje Larsen.

Only following repeated claims of the tape's existence did the UN admit that it did exist and that it was in their possession.

In response to an Israeli demand for a copy of the tape, UN officials offered, to both Israeli and Lebanese representatives, to view an edited version of the recording in which the faces of suspected Hezbollah guerrillas were distorted. Israel has so far refused to accept the UN proposal.

Arab states discuss reviving boycott

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper

DAMASCUS — Arab League experts have opened talks on reviving the boycott of Israel, nearly a decade after it was unofficially shelved following the opening of the peace process.

But nine states of the 22-member Arab League were absent from a meeting the Cairo-based league called in support of the 10-month-old intifadah.

Ahmed Khazaa, commissioner general of the Damascus-based Central Office for the Boycott of Israel – an offshoot of the league – urged reviving the boycott as a tool to liberate occupied territories. He said the boycott was a form of peaceful resistance not in contradiction with international law "because it is based on self-defence and freedom to choose an economic partner."

Khazaa said Arabs should use the boycott – which bans direct dealings, or with third-country companies that trade with Israel – "to force Israel to implement United Nations resolutions."

He said that while the Arabs had chosen peace as their strategic option since 1982, "Israel did not abandon its aggressive nature and continued to foil the peace attempts until it led the peace process to a total deadlock."

Mohammed al-Ajami, head of the Syrian team at the talks, said the aim of the meeting was "to impose an economic blockade on the Israeli enemy and all foreign companies or parties which support its entity, economy and war machine. The boycott should continue as long as the enemy continues the occupation of even an inch of Arab land," he said.

Saudi Arabia's representative to the meeting, Fa'iq Bin Othman, called on Arab states to abide by the boycott rules.

"I sincerely hope that all Arab states abide by the Arab League [boycott] decisions and that our meeting will lead to the support of our Palestinian brothers in the sacred land," he said.

Conference sources said the experts started discussing a report on the status of the boycott and how to revive it after the collapse of peace talks between Israel and the Arabs. The absentees included Egypt, Jordan, Mauritania, Morocco, Qatar, Oman, Bahrain, Djibouti and the Comoro Islands.

The boycott office was established in the 1950s to isolate Israel economically. But implementing its rules fell away over the years, especially after Arab-Israeli peace talks opened in Madrid in 1991.

French Jews try to bring down Holocaust deniers

By ANDREW DIAMOND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — French student groups and anti-racist organizations are trying to draw attention to a university long known as a breeding ground for Holocaust denial and other far right activities.

If they succeed, student leaders say, they will deliver a severe blow to the far right in France.

The University Jean Moulin is named for a heroic leader of the French Resistance who was tortured and executed during the Nazi occupation. But in an ironic twist, the school, also called Lyon-III, has come to be known among French students as the "fascist university."

That reputation grew out of events dating back to 1981, when a group of scholars with strong ties to far right elements in France and Italy created the Institute for Indo-European Studies at the university.

From the outset, one of the scholars' main goals was to pursue what is known in France as "negationnisme" – Holocaust denial.

In 1985, however, the institute found itself mired in controversy when one of its founding members, Jean-Paul Allard, served on a doctoral committee that granted highest distinction to a thesis denying the existence of gas chambers in Polish concentration camps.

The Ministry of Education nullified the dissertation the following year, but Allard, a professor of German at Lyon-III, walked away from the affair unscathed.

Now, as his retirement nears, Allard is again coming under fire. Over the past several months, a series of protests by a coalition of student groups at Lyon-III have managed to focus public attention on Allard and his colleagues.

Last February, members of the National Union of French Students – Independent and Democratic, the Union of Jewish Students of France and a local student organization called Hippocampe drew national attention to the situation at Lyon-III by occupying a research building there.

Carrying banners juxtaposing Moulin and the French Resistance's Gaullist cross with Allard and the Nazi swastika, the organizers denounced Holocaust denial and demanded sanctions against Allard.

The student groups were supported by anti-racist organizations such as the League of Human Rights and SOS Racism. Their actions prompted the university's president, Gilles Guyot, to take action.

Late last month, following a request from Guyot's office, two professors who in 1990 approved with honors a thesis attempting to disprove the Holocaust changed their evaluation of the work to "unacceptable."

The dissertation, completed under the guidance of a Lyon-III history professor, attempted to validate the theories of Paul Rassinier, the father of French Holocaust revisionism.

Guyot subsequently announced that the matter was closed, but student groups did not agree.

They have asked France's Ministry of Education to appoint an independent commission to examine right wing influence at Lyon-III.

The ministry hasn't decided whether to act, but newspaper accounts in Le Monde and Liberation about the situation in Lyon have created the momentum for change.

Earlier this month, a regional commission on higher education summoned Guyot to explain why he approved a check for some $4,000 to the Society for Indo-European Studies.

The society was created by Allard in 1999 after the Institute for Indo-European Studies dissolved itself in the midst of a Ministry of Education inquiry.

As a private organization, the society is not eligible for funding from a public university.

With the Socialist Party holding power in France, observers say it is likely that the student organizations will be granted the more far-reaching investigation they seek.

How far such a commission would be willing or able to go in severing the ties between the university and far right groups is unclear.

Guyot has minimized the involvement of university faculty in right wing activities, claiming that only three professors have clear affiliations with extreme right groups.

But organizers of the student protests disagree. "People who really know the situation can come up with the names of some 20 extreme right members of the faculty," says Philippe Aim, president of the Lyon chapter of the Union of Jewish Students of France.

Other critics of Lyon-III say the school's importance to far right parties – particularly the anti-Semitic and xenophobic National Front – cannot be determined by mere head counts.

Its value, they say, lies more in the theoretical and institutional legitimacy the school lends to Holocaust denial, which in the past has served as a key campaign strategy for the National Front.

Such tactics proved successful in the first round of the 1988 presidential election when Le Pen's National Front Party gained a shocking 14.4% of the vote.

Although Holocaust denial is on the wane in France, Lyon-III nonetheless provides it with the trappings of legitimacy, student leaders warn.

For Jewish students in particular, the struggle involves another dimension. "For Jews like me born after the war, who have been taught the duty of memory since our early age, it is shocking to see people questioning the existence of concentration camps and diminishing the importance of the Holocaust," Aim says.

He is proud to be among those involved in the fight.

Who's David and who's Goliath?

By AMNON RUBINSTEIN

Comment

Hardly a week goes by without some representative of Israel's Arab community coming out with a declaration against the very existence of Israel as a Jewish state. None of these declarations is a demand for equal rights for Israeli Arabs or even a call (justifiably) for recognizing them as an integral part of the Arab nation and the Palestinian people. Instead, each and every one of the declarations is an attack on the existence of Israel as the state of the Jewish people.

The latest attack in this series has been launched by MK Talab A-Sana (United Arab List), who has issued a proclamation that recalls the language of UN General Assembly Resolution 3379 (Nov. 10, 1975), which declared that "Zionism is a form of racism and racial discrimination" and was subsequently revoked in Resolution 46/86 on Dec. 16, 1991. A-Sana has stated that Zionism is "in its very essence racist and colonialist" and that such racism will vanish from the country "just as the Turks and the English disappeared."

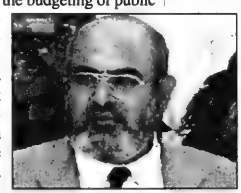
Anyone who is familiar with the characteristic problems of national minorities in other countries – especially in the new democracies that emerged in the wake of the collapse of the Soviet empire – will immediately understand that A-Sana's statement can certainly not be considered the articulation of the aspirations of a national minority.

Such statements would never be made by a representative of the Russian minority in Estonia or the Hungarian minority in Romania or the Czech Republic.

This is the kind of statement that is issued by the representative of a national majority who is addressing a minority group. On various occasions, representatives of Israel's Arab community have actually and explicitly stressed that while the Arabs are a minority in Israel, the State of Israel itself is a minority within a massive Arab-Muslim majority.

These representatives of Israel's Arab population are asserting an undeniable fact: In Israeli society, the Arabs are a minority group that does not yet enjoy substantive, total equality of rights in important areas, such as the budgeting of public services, access to water and land infrastructures and government representation.

From this point of view, Israel's Arabs are truly the other, the different one, who are weak and an "extraordinary case" and whose treatment is a measuring-stick for determining the quality and substance of Israeli society.



Abdul Malek Dahamshe, a United Arab List Knesset member was accused by Israeli police of inciting stone-throwers on the Temple Mount on Sunday. [Isranet]

On the other hand, the Jews of Israel are a small island in an Arab-Muslim ocean. They are the other in the Middle East. The Arab-Muslim ocean does not particularly like islands that are not Arab and Muslim. Christians are in danger everywhere throughout the Arab-Muslim world and their numerical presence in the Middle East is steadily declining.

A war of extermination is being conducted against the non-Muslim minority of southern Sudan, while the Bahais of Iran are suffering persecution. Egypt's Greeks, who constitute a loyal and creative minority group, were the victims of the ethnic cleansing policy pursued by the country's late dictator-president Gamal Abdel Nasser. Meanwhile the Christian state in Lebanon has all but disappeared.

Israel's position is much more difficult than that of these non-Muslim minorities. Unlike the Greeks of Egypt, the Jews of Israel have no other refuge on earth. Unlike the Christians and Bahais of the Middle East, the Jews of Israel are not just a religious minority – their very existence here illustrates the self-determination of a nation that has no other state.

Let us go back to the "prophetic vision" of MK A-Sana: Will Zionism disappear from the Middle East – not like the Turks and English, who had their own respective motherlands, but rather like the Middle East's other non-Muslim minorities that have disappeared or are in the process of disappearing?

The Jewish State of Israel can be destroyed either through war or through the implementation of the Palestinians' demand for the right of return. However, if Israel were to act cautiously and wisely and if it were to forgo non-essential "assets" – such as Jewish settlements in the heart of Arab-Palestinian population centers – in exchange for international backing and domestic solidarity, A-Sana's vision would never materialize. His "prophecy" would thus share the fate of the Arab-Palestinian predictions regarding Israel's collapse in the war that the Palestinians and their Arab brothers and sisters launched against the nascent Jewish state in 1948 – a war in which the results were so tragic for both Arabs and Jews.

A major problem in this context is that the Western world and its media perceive Israel through the prism of its conflict with the Palestinians, a nation that has neither a state nor any political rights. From this particular perspective, Israel looks like Goliath and the Palestinians look like David.

However, if the camera were to be positioned not in front of an Israeli tank, but rather on one of the satellites scanning this region, a different truth altogether would emerge. In the Middle East, Israel is a minority; Israel is David while the Muslim majority is Goliath.

Labour Party set to choose new leader

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

The Labour party will get a new leader in about a month from today. On Sept. 4, the party's central committee will gather at a primary to choose between two candidates: Knesset Speaker Avraham Burg and Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer.

Burg currently leads in the polls, but the outcome is a tossup.

The leadership race was touched off by Ehud Barak's abrupt resignation after losing the Feb. 6 general election to Ariel Sharon, the Likud standard-bearer, by a huge margin.

Barak, who had been leader since the mid-1990s and prime minister since 1999, stepped down after a party revolt last winter.

Barak, who came comparatively close to signing an end-of-conflict agreement with the Palestinians, antagonized some party loyalists, first by calling for the formation of a national unity government with Likud, and then by unilaterally announcing his intention to serve as defence minister under Sharon.

As a result, he was driven from his post, leaving the party effectively leaderless as Labour entered into a national unity government with the Likud, the third since the 1967 Six Day War.

In the wake of these developments, the somewhat left-of-centre Labour party, once Israel's most dominant political force, struggled to regain its footing.

Shortly after Sharon formed his government on March 7, with Labour party stalwarts filling some of its most important positions, Burg and Ben-Eliezer let it be known that they would try to succeed Barak.

They were not the only ones supposedly in the race. Pundits speculated that several of their colleagues – Shimon Peres, Yossi Beilin, Haim Ramon and Shlomo Ben-Ami – would run as well.

Peres, the current foreign minister, has not announced his candidacy, nor is he expected to. At 78, his distinguished career, which stretches back decades, has essentially run its course.

Beilin, the former justice minister and an architect of the 1993 Oslo accords, tried but failed to become acting chair of the Labour party after Barak passed from the scene. His plan was thwarted by its secretary-general, Ra'anan Cohen, a minister in Sharon's government.

Benjamin Ben-Eliezer

Avraham Burg

Ramon withdrew on June 21, candidly admitting that he stood no chance against Burg or Ben-Eliezer, and declined to support either man. Ramon, however, still wants to be prime minister one day. He possesses a wealth of experience, having been health minister in Yitzhak Rabin's post-1992 cabinet and the head of the Histadrut labour federation before that.

Ben-Ami, Barak's last foreign minister, a professor of history and a former ambassador to Spain, pulled out of contention on July 1, sharply criticizing his opponents.

So that leaves Burg and Ben-Eliezer as the sole contenders.

A sabra, Burg is 20 years younger than Ben-Eliezer. Born in 1955, he is the son of the late Yosef Burg, a prime mover of the National Religious Party.

Once a Peace Now activist, Burg was wounded in a grenade attack during a 1983 political demonstration in Jerusalem in which one protester, Emil Grunzweig, was killed.

Elected to the Knesset in 1988, he served on the foreign affairs and defence committee. In 1995, he was elected chair of the Jewish Agency and the World Zionist Organization. Two years ago, he was named speaker of the 15th Knesset.

Politically, Burg is something of a dove, and opposed the Labour party's inclusion in the unity government.

He is considered relatively hawkish, and urged the Labour party to join Sharon's government.

As defence minister, Ben-Eliezer has taken quite a hard line. Unlike Peres, he has dismissed Arafat as Israel's peace partner and declared that his usefulness has come to an end.

Ben-Eliezer finds himself in a delicate situation. Though a pivotal minister in Sharon's cabinet, Sharon may yet turn out to be his adversary in the next election.

Such are the ironies of politics.

The downplaying – and ignoring – of stories

According to Reports

Are we Canadians getting a sufficiently broad picture of events in the Middle East through the mainstream Western media?

When "the story" of the Middle East is reduced to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, as it most often is, other important developments are frequently downplayed or ignored entirely. Some of the major missing stories – such as the status of the Kurds, the Shi'ites in Southern Iraq and the Copts in Egypt, or the Algerians, 100,000 of whom have been killed in a civil war in the last decade – have nothing to do with Israel.

Even broader issues affecting Israel, which have important regional ramifications, such as expanding commercial and military deals with India, the strategic alliance with Turkey, and budding economic ties with the Muslim republics of the former Soviet Union, remain largely ignored. CBC-TV News's fine documentary on the Taliban by Patrick Brown (July 23) was an exception.

Part of the problem is access to the newsmakers, which is easy in Israel, but more difficult in varying degrees in the surrounding regions. Also problematic are the stories that journalists and editors fail to cover. A glaring example is the way various international news outlets mostly ignored July's revelation that despite several months of official denials, the UN finally admitted that it possesses UNIFIL videotaped evidence relating to the Hezbollah kidnapping of three Israeli soldiers last October near the Lebanese border.

Reports of this scandal were big news in Israel, and should have been of interest to the international media, particularly since the reputation of the UN, including its claim of impartiality, was at issue. But The Economist, which covers the world comprehensively, mentioned the controversy only in passing; and the Guardian Weekly, which provides another major overview of the world, did not mention it at all.

In Canada, only the National Post reported on it ("U.S. Puts Squeeze On UN Over Video" by Steven Edwards, July 13), and a couple of Southam newspapers, such as the Calgary Herald and Ottawa Citizen, commented on it in their editorials. Other major Canadian papers, it appears, were silent.

In the United States, the New York Times, the "paper of record," accorded the story only a news digest item on July 7. It was not until July 20 that Clyde Haberman, the Times' Jerusalem-based correspondent, incorporated a few paragraphs about the developing scandal in a story concerning the G-8 call for international observers in the territories. These observers might very well belong to the same UN whose forces have proved so ineffective in ensuring compliance with its own terms of peacekeeping in southern Lebanon under Security Council Resolution 425.

Speaking of Lebanon, scant attention has also been paid to growing tensions between that country and Syria, as well as growing tensions between Prime Minister Rafik Hariri and Hezbollah.

What will it take to pry open the camera's lens?

July 23

• The media reported that security forces foiled an intended bomb attack Sunday in Haifa. Police said a bomb squad had defused a "very large" device and arrested the Palestinian, a member of the Islamic Jihad, who had planted it near a shopping complex.

July 24

• Uri Gushtzin, 18, from Jerusalem's Pisgat Ze'ev neighbourhood, was murdered by Palestinians. The military wing of Fatah took responsibility for the murder in statements read over loudspeakers during the funeral of a Palestinian youth, Rafat a-Nahal.

• Israel's water commissioner, Shimon Tal, said construction will begin soon on three desalination plants along the coast of the Mediterranean.

July 25

• The Prime Minister's Office has hired a Belgian lawyer to handle a war crimes lawsuit filed against Prime Minister Ariel Sharon over his alleged role in the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacre in Lebanon.

• The Knesset passed a bill that will open Israel's communications market, including cable and the Internet, to competition.

July 26

• Israeli and Egyptian sources denied a report that Egypt is considering political and economic sanctions against Israel.

• Ronen Landau, 17, of Givat Ze'ev, was killed by Palestinian terrorists who shot at the vehicle he was travelling in with his father and brother near Jerusalem.

July 27

• Archbishop of Canterbury George Carey, the leader of over 75 million Anglican Christians worldwide, arrived on a three-day visit to Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

Brothers
a folktale

Arnon surveyed the valley below him, as the full ears of wheat swayed in the breeze. This year's crop had been very successful. The abundance of wheat was far more than he needed. If only there was someone he could share it with. But there was nobody. Arnon had never married. He lived in solitude. A sadness descended on him as he cut the wheat he would never need.

Wait! My brother! My brother Jared on the other side of the mountain has a wife and ten children to feed. Surely he needs wheat! As Arnon bundled the stalks together, he realized he hadn't really spoken with Jared for many years. He counted the sheaves of wheat. There were 267 in all. That night, he silently crossed the mountain.... Jared would be too proud to accept charity. Arnon quickly deposited five bundles into Jared's stack, and stealthily returned.

That same day, Jared too was thinking about his brother. For 20 years Arnon has lived by himself. It's a shame I've never really had much to do with him since I got married. I've devoted so much time to my wife and children that I've ignored him. I wish we could be closer, like we used to be. Maybe I should just approach him, and...no, it's been too long.

He finished counting his sheaves. There were 489. That should be more than enough for my family. My family. And what about Arnon? Living a hermit's existence, all alone. He must be so lonely. Maybe I could give him something. That night, he too crossed the mountain, quietly leaving five bundles behind before he furtively returned.

The next morning Jared put the remaining sheaves into his granary, counting them again just to make sure. 487, 488, 489? That's what I had before I gave Arnon five! Am I making a mistake? Did I really give them to him? Maybe I was dreaming or something. Tonight, I'll bring them over.

Arnon also was mystified when he recounted his sheaves. I thought I gave Jared five last night! Maybe I became confused and brought them back or something. I'll bring them back over tonight.

That night, clouds obscured the moon. In darkness, Arnon carefully crossed the mountain again, gently placing the sheaves in his brother's yard. Unbeknownst to him, Jared was on Arnon's side of the mountain, giving him an identical gift. As the two of them returned to their homes in darkness, neither of them realized he had passed the other.

At dawn the next day, Arnon walked outside...and there were the five sheaves, in front of his house! This was too much! He grabbed them and began ascending the mountain for a third time...

Jared, too, was astounded to find his stalks again. He, too, picked them up and began the climb.

As the sun rose, the two brothers met at the top of the mountain. They saw the sheaves in each others' arms and they suddenly understood everything.

"Jared?"

"Arnon?"

They dropped their bundles and embraced. And God looked down at the mountain, Mount Moriah, where in the future the holy city of Jerusalem would be built, and knew this would one day be the site of His Temple.

A Cinderella love story of honour and insight

LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

One interesting thing that you realize when you read a lot of books, especially books for children, is that you see a lot of the same themes repeated over and over.

The Way Meat Loves Salt, by Nina Jaffe, illustrated by Louise August (Henry Holt, first edition 1998, reprinted) is a combination of Cinderella, where a poor, badly treated girl becomes a princess; King Lear, a play by a man named William Shakespeare, about a foolish king who asks his daughters how much they love him; and an old Jewish folk tale.

People in India, Europe and Africa also have versions of the same story.

In The Way Meat Loves Salt, a rabbi in a small town in Poland decides that he has a problem. He knows how much he loves his three daughters, especially his youngest one, Mireleh, but he doesn't know how much they love him (we may realize that there are a lot more serious things to worry about, but he must have be very silly man).

When he can't find the answer in the Talmud or other holy books, he decides to ask them.

His oldest daughter, Reyzeleh, says that she loves him as much as diamonds. His second daughter answers as much as gold and silver. Needless to say, he likes those answers.

But when he comes to his youngest daughter, his favorite, she says that she loves him "the way meat loves salt."

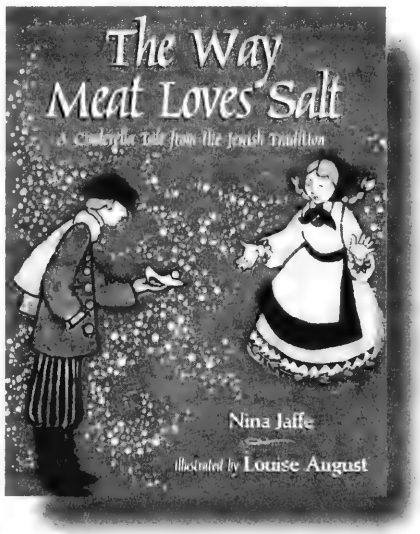
The rabbi becomes furious, and throws her out of the house, telling her never to return.

Poor Mireleh runs away, and cries because she doesn't know what to do. Suddenly, an old man appears, and, because she she has always been a kind child, tells her to go to the home of Rabbi Yitskhok ben Levi, the scholar of Lublin. He also gives her a magic stick.

The rabbi's family, who are very kind, take her in, even though she is crying, dirty and looks like a beggar.

The next day, the family goes to a wedding in Cracow. Mireleh decides she wants to go too, so she taps her magic stick, and asks for a a beautiful dress, flowers for her hair, and satin slippers.

When she gets to the wedding, everyone wonders who the beautiful girl is. The rabbi's son falls in love with her.



Because she won't tell him who she is, and he doesn't recognize her as the beggar girl, he puts tar on the step of the house. Sure enough, when she leaves, one of her shoes gets stuck.

Just like in the Cinderella story, the rabbi's son declares he will only marry the girl whose shoe it is. You can figure out what happens.

But the story goes on in this book. When the family is preparing the wedding, she tells the cooks not to put any salt in the food. Her father comes, and finds the food really awful. He realizes that Mireleh really did love him after all.

In King Lear, the King also realizes that the youngest daughter truly loves him, because when the other sisters abandon him and treat him badly, she takes him in.

It would be interesting to try to find other stories that have the same themes as The Way Meat Loves Salt does. You might go to your library, and ask the librarian there.

Rokitno survivors hold reunion after 57 years

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Five people who survived the Holocaust in a makeshift shelter in a Ukrainian forest were reunited recently in Toronto for the first time since they were liberated by the Russians in April 1944.

The five are the only remaining survivors of an original group of ten women and children from Rokitno, a town in the Volhynian district of Ukraine, who lived in the forest for nearly two years. Although several now live in Toronto, they had never all gotten together until last month, to coincide with the visit of one survivor, Chaim Bar Or, a retired Egged bus driver from Haifa.

Gamulka was seven years old the day the Germans and Ukrainians rounded up the Jews in Rokitno's market square. Instead of counting the Jews as they pretended they would, the soldiers began to slaughter the Jews with machine-guns. Amidst the pandemonium, some people, including Gamulka and his mother, Gitel, managed to run behind some cattle cars from a freight train, and escape into the woods.

Deep within the forest, ten refugees built a lean-to for shelter. Aided by some partisans, they enlarged the lean-to into a crude construction known in Ukrainian as a kurin, or "smoker." It is essentially a low dug-out with earthen walls, and a roof made of branches with a hole to allow the smoke from a fire to escape. This became their home for nearly two years.

"In the summer we would pick berries in the woods, which were plentiful. The fall and winter were tough," Gamulka recalls.

"At night, my mother and the older people would go out to the nearest village (five kilometres away) and beg. They would literally knock on doors at the peasants' houses and beg for something to eat. Sometimes they would get a potato, sometimes they would be chased away...Some peasants were very kind – they themselves didn't have much to eat, but they would give a few potatoes once in a while."

They had no matches, so they had to keep the fire going, day and night, season after season. They had no axe, and had to break the branches off the trees by hand. They had no shoes, and had to go barefoot, even in the snow. They were half-starved, and infested with lice and scabies. Their clothes were rags.

"Sometimes," Gamulka says, "we had visitors – wolves." Then he explains: "The only way to get rid of them was [by] burning pieces of wood. They don't approach you if you have fire in your hand."

Two of their party, Dvoshil Svetchnik and her daughter, Henya, died of dysentery and hunger. "We buried them in the woods. It was an experience that all of us still live with."

After the Russians liberated the surviving members of the group, their paths diverged dramatically. Lave Svetchnik went to Israel, where he took the name Haim Bar Or. Samuel Levin also settled in Israel, while his brother, Alex Levin, became a captain in the Russian army. Both later relocated to Toronto.

Taibele Wasserman, who was three years old in the forest, also went to Israel, where she became Yona Bronberg. She later came to Toronto. Her mother and sister, Rachel and Bluma Wasserman, survived the forest and settled in Israel. Both are now deceased. Niuka Kokel, who was 13 years old at the time, died after the war.

After liberation, Gamulka and his mother went to Bytom, a town in Silesia, and lived briefly in Linz, Austria before coming to Canada in March of 1948 and settling in Montreal. Although he did not speak English upon his arrival, Gamulka eventually attained an MA in English literature, and worked as an English teacher. A husband, father and grandfather, he lost his mother in 1994, and moved to Toronto after his retirement.

Gamulka says that three of the survivors found each other after reading an article about one of them that appeared several years ago in The Canadian Jewish News.

"The four men all have memories from the forest, but the little girl (Taibele), who was only three, doesn't have any memories.

"The happy news is that the five of us have made very good lives for ourselves," he says. "We've managed. We enjoy life."

Out of Rokitno's roughly 2,000 Jews, only 200 or so survived the war, Gamulka says. His father, who was in the Russian army, was captured by the Germans and killed because he was Jewish.

Gamulka's wife, Ala, has been helping to translate the yizkorbuch, or memorial book, for Rokitno from Yiddish into English. "It's the most fascinating kind of work you can do," she says.

Weizmann scientist helps in 'breakthrough'

TORONTO — The FDA recently approved the revolutionary new anti-cancer drug called Gleevec, and the announcement was greeted with particular satisfaction at the world headquarters of the Israel Research Cancer Fund (ICRF).

One of the scientists who played a key role in the research that led to this breakthrough treatment for chronic myelogenous leukemia (CML) and other cancers was Dr. Eli Canaani of Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science. His work has been financially supported for many years by the Israel Cancer Research Fund.

"Final FDA approval of Gleevec, manufactured by the Norvartis Company, although unusually swift, represented the fruits of decades of research on the molecular biology of cancer by many...scientists set on identification and characterization of mutations which cause cancer — an area where Dr. Canaani has been a true pioneer," said Dr. Yashar Hirshaut, president of ICRF.

Canaani, he explained, together with Drs. Robert Gale and Emma Shtivelman, and other researchers including Dr. John Groffen of the National Cancer Institute, Dr. Owen Witte of the UCLA Medical School and Dr. David Baltimore, president of CalTech, discovered the molecular consequences of the formation of the so-called Philadelphia chromosome, a well-known marker for CML.

Working independently, these researchers demonstrated that the Philadelphia chromosome, which results from swapping portions of chromosomes 9 and 11, encodes a novel protein composed of elements of the abl and bcr proteins derived from chromosomes 9 and 11, respectively. The new protein, which is in essence an uncontrolled form of abl, incorporates into the cellular signaling machinery to directly initiate CML.

Gleevec, long known by its chemical compound number, STI-571, effectively binds to and blocks the action of this CML-specific protein. In the clinical trials for the FDA, patients went into remission within weeks. Ninety percent saw their blood counts revert to normal, and 13 percent saw all cancerous cells disappear.

Gleevec is one of the first examples of a whole new class of anti-cancer drugs targeted against specific proteins. In contrast to other types which harm any individual cell, healthy or not, Gleevec appears to kill only the cells producing the dangerous, CML-specific protein. Although Gleevec will initially be used to treat CML and a rare form of stomach tumor, the researchers see great potential for its use against other major cancers.

The Israel Cancer Research Fund is the largest single source of private funds for cancer research in Israel. It is the only voluntary charitable organization in North America solely devoted to supporting innovative cancer research in Israel. Founded in 1975, ICRF has awarded 1,269 grants valued at $23.91 million to fund cancer research at all of Israel's major health research institutions.

Jewish-themed plays presented at Fringe Festival

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A non-Jewish grandmother who was an Oscar nominee as Mother Superior in Lillies of the Field and who, with her Jewish husband, narrowly escaped arrest by the Nazis in Vienna, asked her granddaughter to write a part for her.

Libby Skala fulfilled that request, but not until after her grandmother, Lilia Skala, died in Bayshore, Long Island, at age 98. The 90-minute play, titled Lila!, was presented in the Fringe Festival at the Poor Alex Theatre.

Using simple props and a change of facial expression, Libby played both herself and her grandmother in the one-woman drama.

"My director, Gabriel Barre, felt that my first version was reasonable, but too safe, without risk. He wanted to know what made me tick as well as my grandmother. I wrote five new scenes, one in which I have to give up a treasured sweater. It made me and my grandmother both stronger."

The rewriting came after Libby first presented Lila! at the Kelowna, B.C., Fringe Festival in 1999 and at the Winnipeg and London, Ont., festivals last year. In fact, the play has been produced more often in Canada than in the United States, where Libby, who lives in New York and spends her holidays in Canada, presented vignettes and scenes from a work in progress.

"At 98, my grandmother was sharp as a tack, sharper than many young people. She used to visit our home near Stamford, Conn., every month and spend an hour each time alone with my sister Emily and me. She encouraged me to become a writer, but my focus right now is on acting."

Libby said her grandmother, a Czech, was an illegitimate child who married a Jewish man. They had to use their wits to escape the Nazis, and at that time, they changed their name to Skala, her grandmother's maiden name.

"At one point, my grandfather, who had seen all kinds of abuses against prisoners in Vienna, said he would head for the border and take a chance, instead of remaining in prison."

David Chayim Eden, 39, adapted Life After God, from a short story by Douglas Coupland, who wrote Generation X, although Coupland didn't think his short story was long enough.

"People are welcome to do what they like," Coupland told Eden, who lined up at a book signing at Harbourfront last year.

"He [Coupland] was incredibly generous and didn't want to see my script. He is a very shy man," Eden said.

Eden, who was raised in Dundas near Hamilton, but now lives in Toronto, played all nine characters in Life After God at the Fringe Festival, including the main one, Scout, "a man who never really grew up."

The play deals with people who have not had a religious upbringing "and have nothing to fall back on when times get tough." Scout is one such person. He runs off to a tent on Vancouver Island to try to get in touch with his real emotions, instead of experiencing emotions dependent on anti-depression pills.

Eden hasn't made up his mind whether he is more interested in acting, directing or writing, but makes his living doing theatre administration jobs while he works part-time on his MA in drama at University of Toronto.

He directed The Occupation of Heather Rose in Victoria and an earlier version of Life After God at the London Fringe Festival.

Previously, he wrote If You Asked Me, a one-act play about a woman with Alzheimer's disease performed at the Robert Gill Theatre. Life After God, directed by Jordan Merkur, is being presented at Fringe festivals in Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Edmonton, Victoria and Vancouver later this summer, and Eden hopes Coupland will see it in his hometown of Vancouver.

Playwright Ron Fromstein, 28, of Toronto was so "overwhelmed" by the Trans-Canada highway, (5,500 kilometres), "the longest road in the world," that he wrote a series of plays about it.

One of them, B-Sides and Off-Roads, was presented at the Factory Theatre, and he hopes to remount it later. One of the six characters, who all deliver monologues, is a woman who likes to visit truck stops, intent on finding the trucker who fathered her baby.

Another is a Mountie who is so isolated at his prairie station that he keeps a suspect in custody for company.

Fromstein said the highway is not honoured in art, songs or short stories and is undervalued as a symbol of national unity.

In a one-woman Fringe play at the Poor Alex, Cayle Chernin, of Toronto, co-author with director Ned Vuckovic of an adaptation of Erica Jong's Fear of Flying, uses the words of Jong's well-known feminist novel to act out the sexual freedom of the modern woman.

A native of Glace Bay, N.S., Chernin plays an insecure adventuress in an uninhibited, erotic and funny investigation of female fantasies and realities.

Filmmaker is obsessed with Israel

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Igal Hecht, a young Toronto-based filmmaker, writer, director and producer, has got chutzpah. He's got so much moxy, in fact, that he says Jewish film festivals have refused to accept his latest film, Camels of Nahor, because they claim the story line and conclusion are too controversial and offensive to certain Jews.

"The last thing I wanted to do was offend anybody, but by refusing to accept the film, they are are refusing to accept that a problem exists within the Jewish community," says Hecht, whose 45-minute film has been accepted to the 2001 New York International Independent Film and Video festival.

Camels of Nahor is a love story about Aryeh Cohen, a secular Jew who falls in love with Hadasa Green, the daughter of an Orthodox rabbi. When their relationship is discovered a scandal ensues.

The film explores the misconceptions the two communities have about each other, and aims to show that "a narrow frame of mind needs to be averted."

Though Camels of Nahor is told from a secular point of view, Hecht says he spoke to many Orthodox Jews to ensure his portrayal of the community would be accurate.

Loosely based on a true story, Hecht says he has strong personal connections to all his films, and that he was drawn to the theme because of the rift that exists between secular and Orthodox Jews.

"In Israel this is a major problem – perhaps the second biggest problem facing Israel next to the Palestinian conflict," says Hecht.

"There are some secular Jews who feel that Orthodox Jews don't exist within the frame of Zionist Israel."

Born in Israel, Hecht moved to Toronto when he was 12 years old. He became involved in film at the age of 14 when he enrolled in the media program at Newtonbrook high school. After attending the Humber film school for a year, he went to Israel where he shot Voices of Israel, a short documentary that deals with events from the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin to the current Palestinian conflict.

Returning to Toronto, Hecht attended a two-year radio and television program at the Seneca College School of Communication Art.

Then, last year, Hecht established Chutzpa Productions. Camels of Nahor will be put out under that name.

The opportunity to make Camels of Nahor arose when a teacher at Seneca allowed everyone in the graduating class to make a 21-minute film.

With a six-member crew and 12 actors, the film was shot in Thornhill and North York in early January. Hecht wrote the script and also acted as producer, director, editor and set designer, but says he can't take all the credit.

"I was blessed with a wonderful crew who endured 30° weather to make the film."

In the immediate future, Hecht, who says that he's "obsessed with Israel" and is only interested in writing and producing films that deal with Judaism and Israel, will be making a documentary about Jewish dating and assimilation. He is also completing his first feature-length script, titled Canadian Falafel.

"I can only make films about Jewish contemporary life, the Jewish secular world and Israel – these are the only things that interest me."

Eye on Arts

By BILL GLADSTONE

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART I

In 1859 a London literary professor, David Masson, made a notable attempt to classify the novel, which was still a relatively young phenomenon, into distinct categories or genres.

Influenced by Aristotle, Masson mapped out 13 different categories of novel. As if anticipating the work of Northrop Frye a century later, he also presented a unified theory of literary expression.

Although Masson's categorization seems eccentric to us today – his genres included novels about London, novels about Scotland, and fictional travelogue narratives set in more exotic locales – modern readers may better appreciate his observations on the enormity of the burgeoning literary sphere into which he was attempting to inject some order.

By 1860, spurred on by the rise of train travel and cheap serialized editions that were sold in stations, the English novel had attained an unprecedented acceptance and popularity. By Masson's estimate, at least two new novels were appearing in London each week. In an almost Darwinian sense, they competed for commercial survival on bookstalls already overcrowded with travelogues, histories and memoirs.

Masson reasoned that it was impossible for a reader to keep up with new works. The sphere of literary creation was simply too vast. Any serious lover of literature needed, therefore, some schema or map of the type that he was presenting in order to assess what was important to read.

For readers of modern Jewish literature, Ruth R. Wisse, in The Modern Jewish Canon: A Journey Through Language and Culture (Free Press, 2000) presents such a schema as Masson had envisioned. Paralleling a more recent work by Harold Bloom on modern Western literature in general, Wisse's contribution is a welcome and perceptive roadmap that will inspire readers, myself included, to search out neglected titles.

Not surprising, according to Wisse, the Jewish Shakespeare is none other than Sholem Aleichem, whose comical sufferer Tevye the Dairyman she makes the focus of the first chapter.

Wisse calls the Tevye novels "the most inexhaustible work of modern Jewish fiction" and asserts that Tevye's struggle "anticipates most of modernity's challenges to Jewry, albeit in somewhat milder form ...."

Succeeding chapters focus on pre-Shoah European writers, such as Franz Kafka, who wrote in non-Jewish languages; Russian writers like Isaac Babel and Vasily Grossman, around the time of the Revolution; and the trio from the Singer family of Warsaw (Israel Joshua, Isaac Bashevis and Hinde-Esther Kreitman) who concentrated on Poland of the 1930s.

Later chapters deal with Anne Frank's and other testimonies that emerged in various languages from the cauldron of the Holocaust; Zionism as it is depicted in English literature, from George Eliot's Daniel Deronda to A.M. Klein's The Second Scroll; American immigrant fiction from 1900 to 1950; and post-immigration-generation Americans like Saul Bellow, Cynthia Ozick and Philip Roth who have moved beyond the theme of alienation and being strangers in a strange land. The final chapter examines the young and vibrant field of Israeli literature.

Wisse struggles with the perennial riddle of how to define a Jewish writer, and ultimately excludes from the canon those writers who lack a predominantly Jewish frame of reference. She celebrates the growing importance of English to Jewish literature in the post-Holocaust generation, just as she does the theme of return to Israel and the resumption of Jewish self-defence.

To anyone who cares about Jewish letters, this outline of the contours of a vast body of work is invigorating and refreshing. Wisse's perceptiveness illuminates not only our literature, but ourselves.

More literary musings follow in Part II of this column, next week.

Jewish life along the River Po

By MYRIAM SHECHTER
Special to The CJN

FERRARA, Italy — Between the mountains of Northern Italy and the enchanting Tuscany region, the River Po makes its way towards the Adriatic Sea, ending up in a majestic delta south of Venice.

Lined up along its meandering course are the "golden towns" of the Po Valley: Cremona, resounding with the sweet sounds of the Stradivarius violins; Parma, the favourite adopted home of Verdi; Mantova, of Rigoletto and Virgil fame; Padova, the site of one of Europe's oldest universities; and finally Ferrara, at one time rivaling mighty Venice herself: a town of art, magnificent palaces, shaded alleys and fair gardens, with a rich history and a bustling cosmopolitan present.

My husband, Robert, a travel photographer, and I arrived in Ferrara on a bright spring day. We proceeded to visit the requisite tourist sites, starting with the imposing 14th century Estense Castle, of the Este family, its red walls dominating Ferrara's medieval city on one side and its Renaissance counterpart on the other, and surrounded by 500-year-old city walls and huge parks and golf courses.

A vibrant and attractive town of about 133,000 people, Ferrara is also the site of one of Italy's most important medieval Jewish communities. As we made our way through the cobblestoned streets, we noticed signs of the town's Jewish past. The elegant 12th century Romanesque Gothic cathedral dedicated to St. George had two discreet Magen Davids on its facade, so discreet, in fact, that even our local tour guide was surprised by my noticing them. Perhaps, we thought, a Jewish artisan had left his secret imprint upon this very Catholic structure. (I have seen similar "signatures" in Spanish cathedrals, left there by converso artisans, most notably in Toledo.)

Just across from the cathedral, we faced the statue of the Duke Borso d'Este, whose column had been built from the tombstones of the two Jewish cemeteries; images of the original Hebrew inscriptions are kept in the archives of the Jewish Museum of Ferrara.

Walking through the Piazza delle Erbe – the medieval herb market – we stepped right into the old Jewish ghetto, within the triangle formed by the current Via Mazzini, Via San Romano and Via Vittoria, a maze of narrow alleys and medieval houses.

From about 1100 CE, the story of Ferrara was closely intertwined with that of its Jewish community. First settling next to the fortified walls, the ever-growing community soon moved into the heart of the medieval town.

For centuries, Ferrara was at the confluence of three Jewish immigration currents: from Rome, from Germany and from Spain; in 1492, Ercole I d'Este invited the Sephardi Jews expelled from Spain, thus acquiring for his city the advantages of the Sephardi culture.

The Jews fared much better in Italy than in the rest of Europe and, accordingly, Jews in the Ferrara community were represented in a wide range of occupations, including such famous individuals as Abramo Usque, who produced the Ferrara Bible, and Isacco Lampronti di Ferrara, who wrote the famous talmudic encyclopedia Pahad Izchak.

Between 1627 and 1859, the Ferrara Jews were restricted to the ghetto, a self-sufficient small town within the larger one. With a population of about 1,800, the ghetto had its synagogues, schools and old age homes.

In 1848, King Carlo Alberto proclaimed the emancipation of the Italian Jews, granting them equal rights. The gates of the ghettos were opened – Rome being the last one in 1871 – and the Jews assumed their "rightful place" in society. Within the next century, the Ferrara community produced its own luminaries, such as Joseph Bassani who lived in, and wrote about, Ferrara.

Today, the old ghetto area, with its small attractive stores and refurbished colourful houses, is an essential part of the itinerary of all guided tours.

We had the honour of receiving a personal guided tour of the Ferrara synagogue – an unassuming three story building with green shutters and an arched doorway flanked by two large commemorative plaques – from the leader of the Jewish community, Rabbi Luciano Caro. Though we had arrived just as the rabbi was leaving, he invited us in and shared with us – in the common language of Hebrew – its and the community's history.

The synagogue building, which was donated to the community in 1485, included three congregations: Italian, Ashkenazi and Sephardi. The Italian synagogue was destroyed in 1944 by the fascists; once a Beit Knesset Hagadol, it is now used for festivities and special occasions.

The building, or rather the complex of buildings, includes the Jewish Museum, which offers general community information as well as guided tours of the synagogue and the ghetto.

After the war, the building was not deemed worthy of restoring as the community had shrunk considerably. People had left over the years, looking for work elsewhere, and after the Holocaust took its heavy toll, few people returned. Currently, there are about 100 Jews in Ferrara, mostly older people.

Rabbi Caro led us to the building's second floor, where a small synagogue is open for regular services, and also serves as a school for the five or six Jewish children in the town.

He then led us up and down a few flights of stairs to the former Ashkenazi synagogue. Beautifully kept, with polished wooden benches and gleaming brass candelabra, the synagogue is used only for the High Holy Days. An old plaque on the wall, dated 1652, states that the community had to pay the church a certain amount of monies each year, otherwise they would be chased away.

"It was a famous and large community," Rabbi Caro said. A "travelling" rabbi, he is in Ferrara three days a week, from Friday to Sunday, providing religious services on Shabbat, as well as instruction for the young people, and whatever else the community needs. He also conducts services in Parma and Mantova.

As we said our goodbyes to Rabbi Caro and had a last look at the synagogue, I thought of the two Magen Davids gracing the cathedral. Yes, the Jewish community of Ferrara must have been truly a notable one.

Frozen yogurt kings bask in their success

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Frozen yogurt hasn't been the same since Michael and Aaron Serruya spotted an opportunity and filled a niche.

Fifteen years ago this month, they introduced Canada to Yogen Früz, the little company that has morphed into a conglomerate.

Starting with one modest store in the Promenade Mall in Thornhill, Ont., the brothers expanded frenetically, and now reportedly control about 85 percent of the frozen yogurt market in Canada.

"I sit back and pinch myself," said Michael Serruya, who originated the concept when he was still a graphic arts student at Toronto's Ryerson University.

"It's a dream come true," he said in a recent interview, speaking on behalf of his brothers.

Now 36, he conceived the idea when he realized that there was an untapped market for frozen yogurt in this country. The product was gaining immense popularity in the United States, and Serruya figured it could also be a hit in Canada.

Yogen Früz is and has been very much of a family affair.

Aaron joined forces with his big brother when he was still in junior high school. Samuel, their father, the proprietor of a computer typesetting business, provided the pivotal loan that enabled the brothers to open their first prototype outlet. There was only one caveat: they would have to join Samuel's company in the event of failure.

As it was, Yogen Früz was a phenomenal success. "The numbers were three, four times greater than we had anticipated," said Serruya. "We were inundated with requests for franchises."

In 1987, the Serruyas opened their first franchised outlet in a shopping mall in London, Ont. Within two years, 100 outlets, nearly all in malls, had sprouted up.

Typically, Yogen Früz locations are built on a turnkey philosophy. The Serruyas build the shop and supply the hardware. The franchisee pays the cost of leasehold improvements and buys the equipment from them.

Today, with 4,900 locations in 82 countries, including Israel and the Arab world and soon to be North Korea, Yogen Früz is a corporate colossus – the world's largest franchisor and licensor of stores serving primarily hardpack frozen yogurt.

Thanks to a rapid expansion program kicked off with the acquisition of Yogurty's in 1991, the company, renamed CoolBrands International Inc. about a year ago, began selling ice cream, smoothies, cakes, pies and hot and cold non-alcoholic beverages.

And as a result of long-term manufacturing, marketing and distribution agreements with companies like Tropicana, Betty Crocker, Trix, Yoplait, Colombo, Lucky Charms, Yoo Hoo, Bresler's, Java Coast Fine Coffees and Swensen's Ice Cream, Cool Brands has become a behemoth in terms of revenues and reach.

Now a public company with a market value of $125 million, CoolBrands is run by a triumvirate.

Michael Serruya is chair of CoolBrands while Aaron Serruya, 33, is president and chief executive officer of Yogen Früz Canada and senior vice-president of international operations. Simon Serruya, 30, who came aboard at a later stage, is CoolBrands' vice-president of operations in Canada.

With its headquarters in Markham, Ont., CoolBrands – expected to generate worldwide revenues of approximately $200 million in 2001 – is proudly Canadian. Yet its three plants are in the United States, which accounts for 92 percent of total sales.

Of CoolBrands' 4,900 Yogen Früz outlets, which registered $1.2 billion in sales in fiscal 2000, some 250 are in Canada, nine in Israel and six in Lebanon. The Serruyas own some 100 outlets, mainly in the United States.

Michael Serruya (centre) and his brothers, Aaron (right) and Simon.

Future plans call for setting up 150 Yogen Früz stores throughout the Middle East, of which Israel would have 20 to 25 and the United Arab Emirates three.

Come September, CoolBrands will penetrate North Korea, the reclusive, rigidly Communist state where few companies dare to venture.

Acutely aware that starvation has devastated North Korea in recent years, the Serruyas have targeted prosperous South Korean tourists who frequent North Korean summer resorts.

That CoolBrands has a virtual monopoly of the Canadian frozen yogurt market is a tribute to the brothers' savvy and drive.

Shortly after Yogen Früz appeared on the scene, American competitors moved into Canada, smarting to take over.

No pushovers, the Serruyas beat them at their own game, scooping up prime coast-to-coast triple-A mall locations before their competitors knew what hit them.

The Serruyas subscribe to the belief that if they stay the course, they can vanquish their foes. "You have to be strong, unwavering and passionate about your dream," explained Serruya. "That's what helped us during difficult times."

When they launched Yogen Früz, their youthfulness was a drawback, landlords being somewhat leery of their lack of experience, but by dint of resourcefulness and punishing 80-hour work weeks, the Serruyas won their confidence.

Scions of Moroccan Jews from Tangiers who settled in Canada in 1966, the Serruyas believe they have not reached the limits of their growth.

"There are still tremendous opportunities to grow," said Serruya, the father of three children. His wife Orna is expecting a fourth child in October.

Last year, in what he considers its most important acquisition to date, CoolBrands bought Eskimo Pie, an American icon brand available in 32,000 supermarkets in the United States.

"It is our crown jewel. It has catapulted us into a different stratosphere. It will double our size."

As Serruya tells it, CoolBrands purchased Eskimo Pie after a protracted battle. "They did everything in their power to keep us out, but we overcame the board and management and won over the stockholders."

Having pulled off this coup, the Serruyas are poised to become even bigger global players. Now they are aiming to be the largest ice cream company in North America and, thus, the world. Currently, CoolBrands lags behind Nestle and Unilever, but things could change.

As Serruya put it: "We're well positioned to succeed. We've managed to get this far on limited resources. Today, we're stronger than we have ever been."

Grassroots missions to Israel planned

Palestinians launched an uprising against Israel in the wake of the failed Camp David negotiations last summer.

Committee organizers say they have good reason to believe reducing the cost will entice visitors to Israel. Air Canada, they point out, has occasionally offered return flights to Israel for $650 for those who booked on the Internet. Last May, Kaplan, owner of Israel's The Judaica Centre, travelled on one of those flights – which was full – as did committee member Joy Zigelman. The two bumped into each other in the Geulah neighborhood of Jerusalem and remarked to each other that the normally bustling area was devoid of tourists. Visitors to Yad Vashem, which is usually teeming with tourists, said the place seemed deserted, Zigelman added.

At the time, Kaplan told Zigelman that, "I want to go back and find some creative way to link the State of Israel with the Jewish people."

Back in Toronto, Kaplan met with Friedmann, Zigelman, his long-time friend George Meister and Gabriel Erem. The ISI committee was formed, and about eight weeks ago, it published its first promotional flyer offering an "unprecedented once-in-a-lifetime price and mitzvah" to Israel.

'Designed to send a very clear message to Arafat and the enemies of Israel'

The solidarity mission was "designed to reverse the damaging and demoralizing trend of Israel travel cancellations and send a very clear message to [Palestine Authority President Yasser] Arafat and the enemies of Israel, Never Again," the leaflet stated.

Although neither a price nor a departure date was mentioned, public response to the flyer was immediate and enthusiastic, Meister said.

"People are calling us not for information, but they're asking us to put them on waiting lists right now," he said. Further publicity should raise the program's profile even more so that it becomes "a household discussion," he added.

The program became viable when a philanthropist pledged $1 million towards its cost.

"That opened the door to other philanthropists," Meister said, and now "we're getting strong support from very high profile people in the Jewish community."

Meister was optimistic other substantial donors would come forward, but he declined to identify them or their pledge amounts.

ISI has also partnered with two American organizations – Walk4Israel and the Israel Emergency Solidarity Fund – that are strong supporters of the Jewish state.

The first group on an ISI mission will depart on an El Al jumbo jet. Normally El Al, which is co-operating with the effort, flies 767s with about 200 seats on the Toronto-Tel Aviv route. Putting a jumbo on the route adds some 220 seats.

El Al spokesman Stanley Morais said "we're working in tandem with them. We think it's an excellent idea."

He said that as more people book to go on the missions, El Al will do its best to juggle its fleet to accommodate the added passenger traffic.

The project also has the support of the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO), which will join ISI in "spreading the word" through a promotional campaign, said Rebecca Gluck, the IGTO's public relations manager. "We're very proud to see this display of support. From our perspective, there's no better way of supporting Israel than by going there."

Although solidarity missions to Israel are a regular feature of Jewish communal life, they are generally sponsored by central organizations like UJA Federation.

Participants in a recent Federation mission were asked to pay $1,795 and pledge $500 to the 2002 campaign.

Howard English, director of marketing and communications for the Federation in Toronto, said "anything the community can do to get more people to Israel is important, within certain financial parameters. We would like to get people to go to Israel who would otherwise not go."

Canadians back from Maccabiah with 28 medals, countless memories

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — With suicide bombs going off far too regularly, the 16th Maccabiah Games in Israel came within a hair's breadth of not happening at all.

But in the end, a smaller Canadian team returned from a shortened version of the Games with 28 hard-earned medals in hand and all the prouder for having come to Israel when Diaspora support was needed most.

"There was a level of emotionalism we've never seen before," reported Maccabi Canada president and team Chef de Mission Roy Salomon in an interview a couple of days after getting back to Canada.

"Throughout the whole Games, average Israelis on the street would approach our athletes and tell them how proud they were that we were there. Their spirits were really buoyed by it."

Ironically, Salomon himself almost didn't make it to the Games, his sixth: he resigned when an initial, unanimous decision by the Maccabi leadership of 23 participating nations – including the United States and Canada – to postpone the Games for one year was reversed without going through the "consultation process" he said it should have.

Influential world Jewish leaders persuaded the United States to change its mind, but Salomon said other nations were not equally consulted about the Games getting back on track.

"It was never about them changing their minds, it was about a process being violated," he said.

Ten days after quitting, however, he said, "I ultimately decided I wanted to be with the team, and I'm extremely grateful I did, because it was one of the most emotional experiences I've ever had in the Maccabi movement."

In addition to rousing emotions, this year's Maccabiah was a historic event, on several fronts.

The Games, which began July 16, lasted only one week instead of the usual 10 days. They went ahead amidst the tightest security in their history. And instead of the planned 4,500 foreign athletes, there were about 2,100, among them, an Australian contingent returning four years after the bridge disaster at Ramat Gan stadium that killed four of their members and greatly embittered Australian Jewry.

The Canadian team was reduced from a planned 340 to 190, as cancellations flooded in and organizers scrambled to reconfigure teams and change athletes. The vast majority of cancellations were made after the suicide bombing in Tel Aviv that killed 21 young people.

Even Canada's honorary Chefs de Mission – Montreal businessman Ben Weider and Toronto businessman Paul Godfrey – did not attend, Weider because of previous obligations, and Godfrey, because the final decision for Canada to go came too late for him to be available.

As a result of the smaller Canadian team, Salomon said, the calibre of competition suffered slightly, but the medal count became secondary as the spirits of those athletes who did go soared.

Nevertheless, a medal count there was.

In the Open category (for adult athletes), Canada scored a team gold in the men's 100-metre relay track and field event, and another among Junior athletes in girls' basketball.

The team took two silvers, in Junior boys' basketball and in women's squash, with six individual silvers in Open events going to Toronto's Karen Winer for tae kwon do; Toronto's Charles Cosman, for men's gymnastics, vault; Vancouver's Gretchen DuMoulin for women's track and field, 1,500-metre; Montreal's Hersh Schnayer for 10-pin bowling; Calgary's Zeev Berger (partner from Argentina) for mixed doubles tennis; and another in mixed doubles tennis to Thornhill's Oren Belillti (partner from Russia).

Canada also won 18 bronze medals: team bronzes in waterpolo, men's squash, 10-pin bowling (trios) and men's relay swim, and individual bronzes in bowling, to Toronto's Lisa Abush and Winnipeg's Fern Yamron (one in the Open category, another in the Masters), and to Shnayer (Masters).

Other individual bronzes won were: women's track and field, 3,000-metre event, by DuMoulin; men's gymnastics, by Cosman; women's karate, by Toronto's Marion Green; women's squash, by London, Ont.'s Tiffany Foster; men's karate, by Richmond Hill's Brad Cohen; Masters tennis, by Montreal's Bill Novick; men's doubles tennis, by Belillti and Toronto's Jordon Bohnen; mixed doubles tennis, by Belillti (partner from Russia); and in swimming, for the mixed relay event, by Toronto's Amanda MacNeil, and in the junior boys' mixed relay event, by Ottawa's Jordan Krakower.

The Games' other highlights, Salomon said, included the Maccabiah's first-ever opening and closing ceremonies in Jerusalem, at Teddy Kollek Stadium and Sultan's Pool respectively.

As well, special memorial ceremonies were held for the victims of the massacre of Israeli athletes at the 1972 Munich Olympics, the 85 victims of the 1994 terrorist bombing of the "Amia" Jewish community building in Buenos Aries, and the four Australian team victims of the 1997 Maccabiah bridge disaster.

The Canadian team, led by Toronto's Allen Gerskup, also had its own highlights away from the competition fields. Members visited with victims of the Tel Aviv disco bombing, and Salomon was among several others who won the Maccabi movement's highest honour, the Yakir Award, given for contribution to the Maccabi movement.

Maccabiah athletes Alex Bloomberg (right) and Freeman Poritz, both members of the junior soccer team, with Maccabi Canada officials Nancy Rubin and Roy Salomon.

One Canadian athlete, tae kwon do competitor and coach Corey Mincovitch of Toronto, met his sister for the first time. She had been put up for adoption 10 years before Mincovitch was born and eventually moved to Israel. A friend who met Mincovitch at the airport gave him her phone number; her son, Mincovitch's nephew, was a competitor at the Games.

Ultimately, Salomon was thrilled – and relieved – that the Maccabiah went on without incident.

But he refused, unlike some Israelis, to judge athletes and families who decided not to come, or countries that would have been willing to postpone the Maccabiah, as committing acts tantamount to "giving Yasser Arafat a gold medal."

"Those kinds of statements were very unfair considering that we have throughout the world been among Israel's greatest supporters," he said.

At the closing ceremonies, Maccabi World Union president Jeanne Futeran suggested that despite the real security concerns, it would have been "a much bigger mistake to postpone.

"Can you imagine the celebrations amongst the Palestinians if we didn't come?"

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I am a Grade 10 student at a Jewish high school in the double-graduating year, which means that my class and the Grade 11 class will be graduating at the same time. I am worried about my grades and am being told that if my marks don't improve, I won't get into a good university. I like my school, but I feel as though it would be worth leaving and going to a public school in order to pull up my grades. I'm really torn, and I don't know what to do. HELP!

Concerned

Dear Concerned,

The first thing to consider is that whether or not you choose to continue in the Jewish school system is a matter of your own personal religious commitment. No one but you and your family can really assess which is more important to you, continued immersion in Judaic studies or your grades in the secular classes.

However, being in a Jewish school does involve more work due to the double curriculum. The question is whether the double curriculum and the double graduating class will inspire you to greater performance or cause you undue stress.

The pressure to get into university is on, especially in the double-graduating year. At this point, you should ask yourself – how low are your grades? A lot of teenagers are constantly worrying about their grades when there is no real need to worry.

If your grades are adequate and you would simply like to improve them by five to 10 percent, then all you really have to do is spend an extra hour or two each night studying.

It is also important to take into account that if you like your school, it is probably not worth changing. Remember that transition can be very difficult and you probably won't study much if you're having trouble finding your social niche. Worrying about social concerns is the last thing you need if you're looking to improve your grades.

If you really are torn equally in both directions, make a list of pros and cons and consult your parents and the guidance department in your school. Be as critical and objective about both scenarios as you possibly can be. Only then will you be completely satisfied that you have made the right decision.

I wish you the best of luck and I'm sure you'll make the right choice.

TORONTO — The Embassy of Israel and Canadian Jewish Congress are angry at a front-page Anglican Journal article on the Palestinian-Israeli conflict that ignored Israeli viewpoints and repeated unsubstantiated Palestinian allegations that Israel was sanctioning a "second holocaust."

The editor of the Anglican Journal has acknowledged that his story on the Arab-Israeli conflict is unbalanced and presented only the Palestinian side of the dispute, but he said he was constrained by the agenda set by the group with whom he was travelling.

Vianney Carriere said that in May he accompanied a delegation of Canadian church leaders on a five-day visit to Israel and the Palestinian territories. He said his reporting focused largely on what he saw and heard in their meetings with Palestinians.

"I didn't set the agenda or itinerary for the places they went to and who they saw," Carriere said. "They did not meet many Israeli people. It is one-sided because they met with one side."

The group included representatives of the Anglican, United and Evangelical Lutheran churches.

Repeats allegation of 'second holocaust'

The article, which can be found on the paper's Web site (www.anglicanjournal.com), places the blame for the violence squarely on Israeli shoulders. It accuses Israel of subjecting Palestinians to random attacks and it repeats unnamed Palestinians' allegations that Israel is planning a "bloodbath that has the potential of turning an appalling situation into something unthinkable." The article also refers to other unsupported accusations from Palestinians, who "likened [the situation] to Rwanda, to South Africa in its darkest hour, and to a second holocaust."

The only Israeli cited in the article is a woman "who works for the rights of Palestinians" and who suggested Israel is "hiding behind the memory of the Holocaust."

Carriere said the references to Rwanda and a bloodbath were made on several occasions by various Palestinians speakers, but "I have no comment on the quality of the statement." Comparisons of Israel to South Africa were repeated so often it became "a theme of the people we met," he said.

Congress and the Israeli embassy have complained about the tone of the article, as well as about specific allegations contained in it.

The News in Brief

Canada

Jews Courted

WINNIPEG — Members of six Argentinian Jewish families were in Winnipeg recently on "exploratory visits" to determine whether they will join 21 other Argentine families who have moved to the prairie city since the mid-1990s. Their visits came after Winnipeg Jewish community leaders returned from Buenos Aires, where they briefed 49 families interested in immigrating to Canada.

Israel

UN Official Targeted

JERUSALEM — Forensic evidence released last week proved that shots fired in November at a convoy carrying the UN high commissioner for human rights, Mary Robinson, came from a rifle used by Palestinian forces and from an area under Palestinian control. Palestinian officials claimed at the time that Israeli settlers had fired at her, and her silence in the face of the accusations generally was seen as an indication that Robinson agreed with the Palestinian view.

Leopard Spotted

JERUSALEM — A male leopard was spotted recently in Israel's Judean Desert, confirming that the animals native to that area are not extinct. The leopard was seen near the Dead Sea, where it approached residential areas and attacked some domestic animals.

Bereaved Mother

JERUSALEM — The mother of Shalhevet Pass, the 10-month-old Israeli infant killed by Palestinian sniper fire in Hebron four months ago, has given birth to a girl.

World

Papon Sympathizers

PARIS — The umbrella group representing France's 750,000 Jews expressed outrage at a petition signed by two former prime ministers and other senior figures calling for the early release of a jailed Nazi-era war criminal. Former premiers Pierre Messmer and Raymond Barre were among signatories to a petition sent to President Jacques Chirac last week urging that 90-year-old Maurice Papon, serving a 10-year sentence for helping deport 1,500 Jews to death camps, be released due to his age and frail condition.

Official presses Arabs

ZURICH — Mary Robinson, the top UN human rights official called on Arab states to drop attempts to attack Israel at an upcoming international conference against racism. Robinson said delegates preparing for the conference in Durban, South Africa, should drop wording from a draft document seeking to equate Zionism with racism.

Judge OKs Lawsuit

WASHINGTON — A U.S. judge ruled that a $250-million lawsuit brought by relatives of a Jewish couple killed in a 1996 terrorist attack could be brought under the federal Anti-Terrorism Act against Palestinian officials.

Arsonists Target Shul

MOSCOW — Arsonists attempted to burn down a synagogue in the Russian city of Kostroma, according to the Union of Councils for Jews in the former Soviet Union. Unidentified arsonists placed wooden planks against the side of the synagogue and set them ablaze, but synagogue employees noticed the fire and helped bring it under control.

Scotland Seeks Gecas

LONDON — Officials in Scotland issued an arrest warrant for suspected Nazi war criminal Antonas Gecas. He is alleged to have killed Jews and other civilians when he was head of a special Nazi police unit in a part of Lithuania now in the former Soviet republic of Belarus. Lithuania requested his extradition in February.

Racist Pamphlet

MOSCOW — A monastery in Ukraine considered an important centre of the Russian Orthodox Church recently published a brochure accusing Jews of being devil worshippers. One passage in the brochure, published by Kiev's Monastery of the Caves, reads: "Russian Orthodoxy is called upon to preserve the wholeness of the Church's teachings, as opposed to the kike religion of Satan."

Oberlander Loses Citizenship

OTTAWA — The federal cabinet has stripped former Nazi killing squad interpreter Helmut Oberlander of his citizenship, but it could be a long time before he is deported from Canada.

Oberlander's lawyer Eric Hafemann has promised to appeal the cabinet decision to the Federal Court, and perhaps as far as the Supreme Court of Canada. Following that series of judicial reviews – and if the courts uphold the cabinet decision – Oberlander must still go before the Immigration and Refugee Board for a deportation order.

The retired Kitchener developer could remain in Canada for years as the string of legal manoeuvres plays out.

Meanwhile, Canadian Jewish Congress applauded the cabinet decision to remove Oberlander's citizenship.

"Helmut Oberlander served for 18 months with Einsatzkommando 10a, a unit that was responsible for the cold-blooded murder of more than 90,000 Jewish men, women and children," said Irving Abella, chair of the Congress national war crimes committee. "His deportation brings a measure of closure to a very long and sad story and a measure of justice to the victims of the Holocaust."

In February 2000, the Federal Court of Canada ruled that Oberlander had lied about his wartime activities as a member of a Nazi mobile killing unit, in order to gain entry to Canada.

Israel Now consortium 'transcends differences'

First rally planned for September 23

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If Diaspora Jews can't be physically present in Israel to offer their support, they have to be present in different ways.

That is the raison d'être behind a new initiative of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, a community mobilization consortium that brings together more than 40 Jewish organizations representing a range of denominational and political ideology.

Underscoring the unity theme, Rabbis Moshe Shulman, Baruch Frydman-Kohl and John Moscowitz each spoke at the inaugural meeting in early July as members of the consortium steering committee. The three rabbis are the Orthodox, Conservative and Reform spiritual leaders respectively of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, Beth Tzedec Congregation and Holy Blossom Temple.

This is the second time in recent years Toronto's Jewish community has mobilized on such a large scale. The other occasion was the celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary in 1998, although at that time there were no rabbis taking as prominent a role.

The new consortium was formed in response to a growing concern and frustration over a lack of preparedness for dealing with media bias and political and historical untruths, Julia Koschitzky, consortium chair, told The CJN. Jewish students on campus, in particular, were "totally unprepared," she added.

Having the three rabbis on board, "sends a very strong message that we can transcend all differences when it comes to Israel," said Koschitzky.

The new entity will focus on vehicles like educational seminars, missions to Israel and rallies to achieve its goals. The first rally is planned for Sept. 23 to coincide with support rallies for Israel in New York and other North American cities. Rallies will also take place in Winnipeg and Montreal, and all federated communities in Ontario will participate either locally or by joining the Toronto rally.

After some discussion, organizers settled on the name Israel Now for the consortium. There is a sense of urgency now, not only because of the ongoing intifadah in Israel, said Koschitzky, but because of "rhetoric" over the past few years indicating that Israel did not need Diaspora Jewry to the extent it had in the past.

"It's not business as usual," she said. "Israel's existential life is in danger."

Israel now needs us in a different way, she added. "It's different than it was a year ago or three years ago. Israel needs the support of Diaspora Jewry."

Arie Shevy-Shibi, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada, confirmed the importance of that support. "These are difficult days for Israel," he said. "The recent crisis has been devastating to Israeli tourism Hotels have closed down, about 50,000 employees have been laid off and over 2 billion dollars (US) have been lost."

The existence of the consortium will not hinder or restrict anything any individual organization wants to do for Israel, Koschitzky clarified. "We encourage all organizations to do their own missions," she said. "We're there to reinforce them and help them."

To the best of her knowledge, Toronto's consortium is unique. Such advocacy initiatives are typically federation projects; the Toronto consortium differs in that it is considered more of a "grassroots" effort.

"We hope it could be a model for other communities to follow," said Koschitzky.

How would Canada act?

Most feeling and sentient human beings would be appalled and saddened by the deaths of helpless children caught in the controlled chaos of military actions.

And thus were we too appalled and saddened when news broke of the two young Palestinian children killed by errant shrapnel in the aftermath of a military strike by the IDF against Hamas headquarters in Nablus.

From the editor's desk

The Office of the Prime Minister of Israel was also similarly affected. It issued a statement of profound regret over the deaths of the two children.

Of course, the expression of regret cannot make amends for the terrible loss of life, but it does show the state of mind and heart of the Jewish State as it tries to prevent fresh acts of terror against its own people.

The elimination of the six Hamas leaders in the Nablus apartment was a pinpoint operation designed to minimize the risk to civilians. Alas, the calculation of that risk was not foolproof. It did not adequately consider the foreseeability of the flying shrapnel and the nearby children.

Israel was criticized by most countries and the action condemned as excessive, yet another extra-territorial assassination that is beyond the law.

But the criticisms and condemnations by fellow democracies are hypocritical; by neighbouring Arab countries or the Palestinian Authority, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah or Hamas, absurd and farcical.

In truth, the Palestinian children were the latest horrible victims of the war that Palestinian leaders, including the six key Hamas operatives who lost their lives when the helicopter missile struck the apartment, launched against Israel some 10 months ago.

Israel is in a quandary faced by no other democracy on earth. It is important that at least the readers of The CJN understand this.

The majority of its people want to find a way to make peace with the Palestinians, but they are increasingly becoming resigned to the gloomy truth that peace in the foreseeable future is not likely. Nevertheless, most Israelis still cling to the hope that some sort of disentanglement, if not a full peace between the two peoples, is feasible.

Palestinian leaders such as Yasser Arafat, however, have refused to accommodate any arrangement of peace or disentanglement with Israel unless Israel first agrees to dismantle itself as a Jewish State and disavows any claim to the Old City of Jerusalem and the site of the Jewish Temple in particular. Arafat's position has led most Israelis to conclude that he is interested in peace merely as a pretence.

But there is not even a pretence with the extremist, fundamentalist, Islamic Palestinians, of which there are three distinct groups. They openly, publicly, refuse to abide the mere idea of a Jewish State in the Middle East.

Thus with the Arafat-led grouping of Palestinian leaders, negotiations might be feasible, even if only over a pretence.

With the fundamentalists, however, no negotiations are possible. Their aims are quite plainly and shamelessly the murder of Jews, the destruction of Israel and the replacement of Israel by a devout, theocratic Palestinian state.

As we have seen with bitter, searing tears since last September, the preferred tactic of the fundamentalists is to sow terror among the people of Israel, to wreak maximum havoc on the streets of Israel and to deliberately kill or maim as many young innocent Israeli children as possible.

Since last September, Hamas and its allies have sent more than 20 suicide bombers into Israel. Since the signing of the Oslo accords in September 1993, more than 80 suicide bombers have been dispatched into Israel. Indeed, an alert, courageous Egged bus driver, last Thursday near Beit She'an, thwarted a suicide bomber clutching his heavily laden bag, from succeeding on his intended bloody passageway to Paradise.

Israel's quandary is this: How can it best protect its people from the usually hapless, exploited terrorist for whom death is not a deterrent but part of the glory of the mission? Must Israel wait until after the terrorist strikes before it metes out justice? And then upon whom would the sword of justice fall when the terror claims also the terrorist? If not Israel, who among the Palestinian leaders would mete out justice?

Like every other country on earth, Israel has the right, indeed the obligation, to defend its citizens from any attempt to harm them. Like every other country on earth, Israel need not wait until after its people have been struck down before it strikes at the hands that killed or the minds that planned the killing.

Israel was acting on the advice of its intelligence services that Hamas was planning to strike again into the heart of Israel. The six Hamas leaders who were killed in the Nablus apartment were among Hamas' top minds.

Sheikh Jamal Mansour and Sheikh Jamal Selim Damoni, two who died in the Nablus attack, openly supported suicide attacks in Israel's cities. Ha'aretz wrote of them: "In public they lauded the attacks and encouraged their execution, while in secret they planned and prepared further attacks."

In all honesty, in all decency, would any democracy on earth, behave other than the way Israel is behaving in its valiant effort to prevent the murder of its citizens? How would we want the government of Canada to act in our defence?

Despite ongoing violence, conflict can end: Mitchell Report author

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite ongoing violence in the Middle East, Senator George Mitchell believes the conflict can be brought to an end.

The U.S. statesman, whose report on ending the violence in the Middle East was released in May, will speak about conflict resolution at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's campaign launch on Aug. 22 at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel.

The former chair of peace negotiations in Northern Ireland, Mitchell – who retired from the Senate in the mid-1990s – will discuss his experiences dealing with both conflicts, the similarities and differences between them, and some of the principles that apply to conflict in general.

"I believe there's no such thing as a conflict that can't be ended," said Mitchell in a phone interview last week from his office in Portland, Me. "Conflicts are created and sustained by human beings, and can be ended by human beings."

Among the recommendations of the Mitchell Report, upon which current negotations are based, were reduction of violence on both sides and confidence-building measures.

Despite a lack of implementation of the recommendations, Mitchell remains optimistic. "It's easy to become discouraged," he said.

Recalling his two-year stint as chair of the peace negotiations in Northern Ireland, Mitchell said he was asked almost daily what the point was of continuing the negotiations. The answer, he stated, was that the alternative is unconscionable. In that case, there was virtually no progress until the last couple of weeks before an accord was reached, he pointed out.

Although he admits to having become discouraged "often, regularly" over the situation in Northern Ireland, he never felt the situation was hopeless, he said. "And I don't feel it's hopeless in the Middle East."

The current violence adds to the urgency of the recommendations, said Mitchell.

He believes there are a number of reasons for lack of progress. "The conflict is very longstanding," he said. "There is a lot of pain, sorrow, death and destruction. Emotions are running high. Obviously it's a difficult situation."

The evolution of the peace process over the past decade indicates that progress is possible, he added.

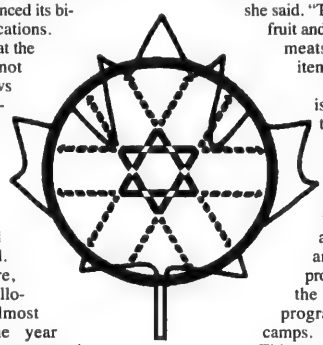
The question of whether Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon are capable of bringing about peace is irrelevant, Mitchell feels. "They are the people chosen to lead their people ... They're the people with whom we must deal."

He believes both sides want a way out of the current situation. The challenge, he said, is to immediately and unconditionally end the violence, rebuild shattered confidence through security measures, and resume negotiations.

Spring allocations down at Mazon Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the past, there was always a good news/bad news scenario when Mazon Canada announced its bi-annual round of allocations. The bad news was that the need for food was not abating; the good news was that the organization was usually in a position to announce an increase in the funds it was distributing.



This year, there's not as much good news to go around. The need is still there, but the spring 2001 allocations are down almost $120,000 from the year before, reversing a two-year trend of increasing distributions to hunger relief agencies.

Mazon Canada distributed $207,250 in the spring, down from $325,402 the year before. Future allocations will likely also be less than had become the norm in the last two years, said Mazon executive-director Jacqueline Kott-Wolle.

Three years ago, Mazon received a $200,000 bequest from a donor who wished to remain anonymous. "That put us in a very good position for a few years. Then reality set in. It's hard," said Kott-Wolle.

Over the past two years, Mazon has completely distributed the $200,000 bequest. As a result, the 1999 and 2000 allocation were the highest since the organization was founded in 1987. It distributed $674,132 in 2000 and $534,600 in 1999. The next best year was $388,392 in 1998.

Mazon knew tougher times were ahead in 2001 and warned its beneficiary agencies not to expect as much in this year and beyond.

Nevertheless, "a lot of groups became dependent on that level of funding. It was hard" to tell them to expect less this year, Kott-Wolle said.

Even when the one-time bequest is factored out, Mazon's allocations were down from previous years. Kott-Wolle suggested the stock market downturn and the economic slowdown are limiting the contributions Mazon is receiving.

Still, "times are just as bad as they've ever been" for people short of food, she said.

"It seems more and more families and individuals are in great need. This year, we have funded our traditional programs including food banks which use our funds for the purchase of items which are not normally donated to them through food drives," she said. "These items include fresh fruit and vegetables, milk, bread, meats and other healthy items."

Kott-Wolle said Mazon is also funding community garden projects, in which people raise their own food crops, summer gleaning programs, in which people are bused to farms where they are allowed to pick berries and fruit, street relief programs to deliver food to the homeless and food programs at various summer camps.

This year, Mazon expects to publish a list of organizations in major centres across Canada that accept and distribute kosher and non-kosher food donations from the public.

In addition to its funding programs, Mazon is busy raising its profile in the community, with a special focus on youngsters, Kott-Wolle said.

Mazon asks parents who are planning bar/bat mitzvahs, parties, and other social events to donate three percent of their food bill to Mazon. In addition, Mazon is introducing a kids' birthday program in which Mazon provides parents with (empty) loot bags labelled with the Mazon logo and an explanation that people experiencing hunger will benefit from their party.

Parents also have the option, in lieu of a loot bag, of choosing special cards that can be handed out to guests, explaining the Mazon contribution.

In addition to the tithing element, Mazon raises money through the sale of greeting cards, place cards and from charitable contributions.

Its two largest fund-raising events are the Food Fest in Montreal and the Kosher Gourmet Gala in Toronto. Last year, the Food Fest raised more than $200,000 while the Gala grossed $85,000.

Mazon, which bills itself as "a Jewish response to hunger," allocates its funds to grassroots organizations that help feed Canadians in need.

In the spring round of allocations, 134 organizations across Canada will receive grants ranging from $500 to $4,500.

Seeking 'champions' for Canada

The first ministers' meeting last week in Victoria ended last week with more than the usual theatre and feigned sense of achievement. The final communique was clearly a quickly cobbled together comity for the cameras. Its purported message was one of agreement among the provinces and territories aimed at the federal government, demanding, as always, more money.

But the inter-provincial bickering could not really be masked. It had dominated the news for nearly a month prior to the conference. And except for the miraculous emergence of a unanimous joint statement at the close of the meeting, it had also dominated the proceedings themselves. And yet it was still overshadowed by the predictable squabbling between some of the provinces and Ottawa.

There is no denying that, in this day and age, policy-making and governing are complicated and difficult. Our lives and problems are interconnected on grids and axes that span diverse boundaries – personal, familial, communal, national, economic, political and geographic – and that even reach heavenward through mysterious technology into the remarkable majesty of the stars.

Yet the search by our leaders for solutions seems outdated, mediocre.

As confirmed last week in the Globe and Mail by Fred Cutler and Matthew Mendelsohn, two political scientists at UBC, we need more from our leaders and from our political institutions. "The preliminary findings…: suggest that most people blame both orders of government for the failure of our federal system and hope for some process that would force governments to work together." The professors suggest that we want our leaders "to push our institutions… toward the more collaborative model… with formal intergovernmental institutions for decision-making."

We urge the first ministers and the prime minister to turn their attention to the professors' research and collaborate on Canada's behalf.

Finding one in basketball

It was against this backdrop of the first ministers' meeting that basketball superstar Vince Carter signed a long-term commitment with the Toronto Raptors. The money involved, it is true, is beyond comprehension. But it was not a factor in Carter's decision, for he would have received the same maximum amount from any number of teams. In effect, Carter signed a long commitment with Canada, a refreshing departure from the norm these days, when professional athletes and others seem eager to leave Canada, and our politicians seem incapable of truly championing it.

How we live in Israel

On a recent visit to Montreal I was shocked to learn how most members of the Jewish community regard the current situation in Israel. This letter should provide useful insight into how we really live our lives there today.

Motza'ei Shabbat I was bored, so I went out for a walk. I found muself among crowds of Israelis – religious, non-religious, young, old strolling about along Jerusalem's Ben Yehuda pedestrian mall. Couples with baby strollers and laughing teenagers enjoyed the cool Jerusalem night air. I had cold lemonade and watched the noisy crowds and then walked down Jaffa Road to the Old City, its majestic walls calling out to me on this second day of the Hebrew month of Av. I walked past the Armenian Quarter and into the Jewish quarter, which was filled with people. The sounds of prayer echoed over the courtyard and up to the wall. I stood in silent prayer for several minutes.

My fellow Israelis and I are not afraid. We are not staying in our homes. We are not living in fear. Our city is not under siege and neither is our beloved land. Our children are still laughing, singing and dancing like normal children. We are still coming to the Kotel in large numbers. Our lives are tense; at times, the sound of a bomb in the distance or the shattering of glass shakes our resolve. Nevertheless, we continue and will continue to live in our homeland. God commanded Moses, our prophet and teacher, to tell Israel that this land is ours forever. We are starting to believe it is possible. We have a long way to go, but living in Jerusalem, it is easy to believe that our people have returned to Zion.

An Answer to Dry Bones

I cannot resist making this comment. It seems to me that the answer to Dry Bones' gentle rabbi's question on the absence of Jewish holidays in August (CJN, July 26) should be mere chance.

You see, the last major festival to take place in August was Rosh Hashanah 4634, which coincided with the Gregorian date, Thursday, August 31, 873 CE.

Today, Rosh Hashanah cannot be any earlier than the Gregorian date September 5, and this will happen Thursday, September 5, 2013, inaugurating the Hebrew year 5774.

Now, if Dry Bones' gentle rabbi can wait patiently just a little bit longer, then he will be granted the pleasure of celebrating Shavuot 16, 766 (according to the Hebrew calendar) on Friday, August 1, 13,006 CE and no longer have to face this question.

Canada's Moroccan Jews I

I immigrated to Toronto from Morocco in 1957, became a board member of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS) in 1962 and joined the organization as a staff person in 1964. In my professional capacity, I received literally thousands of immigrants over the years. I am therefore well-placed to flesh out the interesting but minimally anecdotal record on Moroccan Jewish immigration to Canada, presented in Rabbi Yehiel Benayon's Through a Sephardi Window column, "Diefenbaker, Moroccan Jewry" (CJN, July 26).

It was JIAS, working closely with the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) and the U.S.-based Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS), which made Moroccan Jewish immigration to Canada possible. What opened Canada's doors was a successful joint representation by JIAS-CJC to the government in 1950, whereby JIAS (through (UJA funding) accepted full responsibility for the integration of the new arrivals and undertook that they would not be a public charge for five years.

A HIAS office dealt with the requests directly in Morocco and made the appropriate representation to the Canadian Embassy in Paris. On two occasions (1963 and 1965), the Canadian government itself sent missions to Rabat to expedite the process. JIAS in Montreal received the completed applications and arranged to settle the immigrants, mainly, but not exclusively, in Montreal and Toronto. Moroccan Jews went on to build vibrant communities that have enriched all of Canadian Jewry.

Canada's Moroccan Jews II

I would like to correct a mistake that appeared in the column Through a Sephardi Window (CJN, August 2) by Rabbi Yehiel Benayon.

Prior to their exodus, the Jews lived in North Africa, or Maghreb, for at least 3,000 years. The oldest Hebrew inscription outside Israel was found in Volubilis, today Oualili, in Morocco. When Dido, the Phoenician empress, chose Carthage, in today's Tunisia, as the site of the capital of her empire, the builders uncovered gravestones written in Hebrew. The year was 813 BCE.

It took the Arabs 50 years to defeat the Berbers and conquer North Africa. Toward the end of this long war, the Berbers were led by a woman, The Kahena, or Dahyia, of the Djerawas, a Judaized Berber tribe. Her victory over the Arab general, Hassan ibn Numan, made her Queen of the Maghreb. She was eventually defeated in 698.

Why Israel is losing the media war

The following is the first of two articles. Part 2 will be published next week.

By DAVID MARGOLIS

In mid-April, a bomb factory "work accident" that Palestinian spokesmen falsely described as an Israeli rocket attack ripped through the Ramallah Force-17 headquarters. As newspeople descended on the scene and got to work, Palestinian Authority security personnel roughly confiscated film from photographers and TV cameramen.

"They made it quite clear," says Mark Lavie of the Associated Press, that anyone who resisted "would not have a happy day."

As a result, photos of the blast did not appear on TV screens. Some news services did not even bother to report the film confiscation. But the false accusation of an Israeli rocket attack lingered in media reports for the next day or two.

In a sea of details, do such omissions and shadings accumulate to resemble systematic media bias against Israel? Do individual media outlets purposely slant the news to favour the Palestinian side? Or is anti-Israel media bias a myth, with reporters, under constant pressure to be first with breaking news, doing their best to explain fast-moving and highly emotional events?

A three-month investigation of the foreign press in Israel reveals that some foreign correspondents do impose their personal sympathies on the news they report. More ominous for accurate reporting, however, is the success of the Palestinian Authority (PA), through intimidation of journalists and manipulation of the journalistic process, in making sure that its version of events dominates the West's television screens and newspapers. Meanwhile, Israel's own efforts to deliver its message – ineffective, as even Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's media chief acknowledges – add yet another reason that Israel seems to be losing the media war.

Obstruction And Intimidation

During the Oct. 12 lynching of two Israeli soldiers in Ramallah, Palestinian police as well as demonstrators, eager to keep the event from the world, punched, kicked and even threatened journalists with knives in order to confiscate their film, according to eyewitnesses. A local photographer for a major American daily was kept by PA police from recording the crowd's celebratory dancing after the murders. Like many journalists interviewed for this article, she asked to remain anonymous, saying it "would jeopardize my security to be quoted by name."

After the lynching, when an Italian news crew's video was broadcast worldwide, Italian journalist Ricardo Cristiano – apparently concerned that he would be associated with the crew – wrote a letter of apology to the official PA newspaper Al Hayat, promising to "respect" the PA's "rules" for journalists.

In March, in an atmosphere hot with suspicion and hostility, Marwan Barghouti, leader of the PA's Tanzim militia, warned outright that any Israeli journalist entering PA areas would be killed. Since then, most Israeli journalists either stay home or make sure to be accompanied by well-connected Palestinians.

Barghouti also threatened harm to any Palestinian who co-operated with Israeli newspeople, ratcheting up the danger for Palestinian journalists, who have long been under implied or explicit threat if their coverage displeases a high official or is labelled harmful to the Palestinian "cause."

In short, the Palestinian campaign to control the news by force or threat, while not new, has become pandemic. Since it is largely restricted to local journalists, foreign correspondents generally fail to see it. With the media battle less a war of words than of pictures, foreign print journalists are, in fact, the group least likely to feel the pressure. And if on occasion they do see it, they generally shrug it off as insignificant.

That doesn't mean, however, that Palestinian intimidation is merely a local issue. It is not. Because the process of gathering and disseminating news to Western media now depends so much on Palestinian journalists, their allegiances and the pressures on them have a crucial effect on how news from Israel is reported worldwide.

Familiar scenes of Palestinian violence during these past 10 months. [RNS/Reuters photos]

According to the Committee for the Protection of Journalists (CPJ), for years the PA has "muzzled local press critics via arbitrary arrests, threats, physical abuse, and the closure of media outlets," thereby frightening most Palestinian journalists into self-censorship.

"It's a Mafia situation," corroborates a Palestinian journalist, citing journalists as being "threatened, beaten and made the targets of death threats, even from high officials such as [West Bank Preventive Security Service commander Jibril] Rajoub and Barghouti. And they do not report it," he adds, either to professional organizations, because any complaint would only increase their danger while, if it interfered with their access to officials, would put their jobs at risk.

The 220-member Foreign Press Association (FPA) has neither investigated nor undertaken action against Palestinian intimidation of journalists. "The FPA doesn't want to piss off the PA," snorts one foreign correspondent.

New York Times correspondent Bill Orme, the member of the FPA board of directors who monitors problems of press freedom and press access – "not press bias," he is quick to say – acknowledges that the FPA has not "gotten into" the subject of intimidation.

"We're a member organization, we respond to complaints," he explains. Having received no complaints about intimidation, the FPA ignores it.

Violence against journalists does not only originate from the Palestinian side, however. Nearly two dozen journalists, mostly Palestinians, have been shot by Israeli soldiers (including CNN's Ben Wedeman, wounded in the back by live fire in Gaza). Some have suffered very serious wounds. In only one or two cases has the IDF's investigation resulted in identifying or punishing the perpetrator.

Ranaan Gissin, foreign press and public affairs adviser to Sharon, says the problem is that journalists "want to be where the action is – they want to see the bullet come out of the barrel."

Because they work in the line of fire, it is difficult, he says, for soldiers to distinguish them from demonstrators. However, according to the CPJ, Israeli security forces and Jewish settlers have beaten journalists covering the political violence, in some cases with Israeli soldiers looking on.

The BBC's Paul Adams recounts that his camera crew was manhandled and had its car tires slashed by Jews in Elon Moreh, a West Bank settlement. (Adams was also roughed up by a Palestinian crowd in Bethlehem and forced to flee with his camera crew. The Elon Moreh event became part of a BBC report; the Bethlehem incident did not.)

While maintaining its silence on Palestinian intimidation of journalists, the FPA has firmly protested Israeli violence against journalists with letters to high government officials. No journalists interviewed believe, however, that shootings by Israeli soldiers represent Israeli government policy or that soldiers are targeting them specifically as journalists, let alone as individuals.

Nor do Israeli officials threaten journalists, take sanctions against those whose reporting displeases them or try to control what journalists write. But those are exactly the techniques that have helped the PA determine a lot of what Americans and Europeans see and read in the "news from Israel."

Making News

As the Palestinian uprising grinds on, the words and especially the pictures that record it are molded mostly by Palestinians. How did such an extraordinary situation develop?

Israeli journalists who still go into Palestinian areas make certain to be accompanied by Palestinians whose connections with the security services can protect them, but that access also has a downside.

"If you're accompanied in this way, you're also restricted in what you see and are able to report," says Khaled Abu Toameh, a Palestinian reporter for Israeli, American and Arab outlets. "It's a little like the way foreign journalists in Syria or Iraq are followed by security people all the time."

Foreign journalists – many of whom also don't go out into the field – commonly rely on Palestinian stringers for information. "The Palestinian stringers feed the foreign press with material that is acceptable to the Palestinian authorities," says Abu Toameh. A journalist, he adds, is "totally in their hands."

Foreign journalists also rely on Palestinian assistants, called "fixers," who know the language, can ensure easy access to officials and events, and will arrange anything a reporter needs, from a driver to a translator. These fixers are not professional journalists and are often affiliated with a political or security group – part of their job is to impose their point of view.

As for pictures, 80 percent of camera operators now working in PA areas are Palestinians, estimates a journalist for a Dutch agency, "so the pictures, with all their pathos and drama, come from the Palestinian side." Her estimate may be low. Veteran Israeli commentator Ehud Ya'ari judges that over 95 percent of the pictures shipped to foreign and Israeli channels are supplied by Palestinian film crews.

In a recent article in the Jerusalem Report, Ya'ari wrote that Palestinians now "have effectively taken control of the reporting on the intifadah. The vast majority of information of every type coming out of the area has been filtered through Palestinian eyes, or often, has actually been composed in the first place by Palestinians."

In short, news from Israel is generated by people loyal to, and afraid of, the Palestinian authorities. "They simply don't dare film anything that could embarrass the PA," Ya'ari says. "So the cameras are angled to show a tainted view of the Israeli army's actions, never focus on the Palestinian gunmen and diligently produce a very specific kind of close-up of the situation on the ground."

Ya'ari himself does not go into Palestinian areas. Abu Toameh, who does, calls Ya'ari's analysis "200 percent correct." But are the foreign correspondents, journalists who have reached the top of their professions, so lazy or easily fooled as to accept propaganda for truth?

No doubt some are, but Fiamma Nirenstein, correspondent for the Italian daily La Stampa, offers a different theory as to why news reports are so often unsympathetic to Israel. The journalists, she hypothesizes, are the victims of their own nearly uniform "predilections" to see events within a left-wing, pro-Palestinian and often unrealistically romanticized framework.

That is, many correspondents accept what comes to them from Palestinian sources because they are already predisposed to mould events into a similar form.

A 200-Year Anniversary

A few weeks ago, I spent five days in Germany, attending a very special conference.

The celebration I travelled to join was the 200th anniversary of the beginnings of Reform Judaism. Back in 1801, a lay person by the name of Israel Jacobsohn, born in the little central German town of Halberstadt, decided to do something that had not been done before. Looking around his community, he noted that poor boys and girls were not properly looked after. With his own money, he established a free school for them in Seesen, a small town in Westphalia, instructing the children of both sexes together, something that was then (and in some communities still is) strictly taboo.

His critics accused him of introducing his wards to un-Jewish practices, though his teaching was quite traditional. He did not intend to establish a new movement, quite on the contrary: the practices of the Jewish people were important to him, and the innovations he introduced were meant to make Jews of his day more loyal to their faith. However, the wrath of the rabbinate came down upon him. This only encouraged him to stick by his guns.

Now, in Halberstadt, the 200th anniversary of this modest beginning was being observed by representatives from all over the world. Halberstadt has no commercial airport and, in order to reach it from Berlin, one has to change trains in Magdeburg or drive two to three hours by car. I did the latter and, on arrival, found myself in the kind of environment in which I was born: a small Jewish community with a sense of tradition, which makes for a pleasant and homey environment.

Going back to Germany no longer elicits the kinds of sentiments it once did. The Nazi regime is now long past, and a new generation finds its way into the future very much the way we do in North America. Do anti-Semites still exist over there? Of course they do, but they are held to a small and ineffectual minimum of influence by a combination of provincial and federal governments, as well as by public opinion, which has embraced democracy. And not to forget: the nation is Israel's most sturdy supporter.

Germany's lifestyle is not much different from ours, and the Jews, despite their small numbers, try to invest the religion with as much meaning as possible. Because we here are many, we have it quite a bit easier, though we have not made the most of it. Our advantage in numbers and environment is enormous, but our success in making our lives truly Jewish and giving it a special relevance is still falling short of its potential.

Trying to make sense of Israeli life

No matter how long an immigrant lives in his/her adopted country, various things about the place remain forever a mystery. That's certainly true in my case. After close to 11 years in Israel, many aspects about life here still leave me baffled.

Long-time readers of this space may recall that I devoted two columns to this subject in the past. Given that a few years have since elapsed, that it's summertime and that I wanted to take a break from the conflict with the Palestinians, it seemed fair game to present a new selection of enigmas of Israeli reality.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

The following examples, some obviously of greater consequence than others, are in no particular order. They show that I still have a lot to learn.

Aryeh Deri's magic continues – He may be in the slammer for massive corruption (and still facing more charges) but the former interior minister has lost little of his huge political influence on Knesset members, power brokers and, of course, fervent supporters of Shas.

No ticket to ride – If there is one place in this world where an effficent train connection is needed, it's between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. Sure, there's always lots of talk of building a new line for this route (some day) but it defies logic that there's no train service between the country's two largest cities.

What a mess – Israelis have never been known for keeping public areas clean. All the more reason it's hard to understand why there are so few garbage cans in most local and national parks.

Bring your own flashlight – Try reading a newspaper or a book in public buses in Israel after the sun goes down and you'll need glasses in no time. This thanks to the stinginess of transit authorities in providing decent light for passengers who want to read while they travel.

Stand by me – Why are Israelis so incapable of waiting in an orderly line when need be?

This way out – When waiting for an elevator, why are Israelis so incapable of letting people get out first before barging in?

Sign language – If Arabic is supposed to be Israel's official second language, why is it used so sparingly and inconsistently in public areas, and why don't the country's Arab citizens seem to mind?

Get lost – Try asking directions to find a specific street and strangely few of the locals seem to know where it is – although that won't stop them from telling you which way to go.

Real money – There's no escaping the US dollar in Israel, even if nobody is quite sure why prices in so many sectors are quoted in dollars.

Tailpipe blues – Despite the excessive price of gas and the already polluted air, most Israelis have yet to learn the value of turning off their cars and trucks while waiting in their vehicles.

Good morning – It seems imported breakfast cereal is worth its weight in gold. Why is it twice the price that people pay in Canada for the same thing? Equally inexplicable, why do they still sell well? Even the price of local brands is a major rip-off.

No storage here – Most Israeli homes and apartments – even the more luxurious ones – are built without walk-in cupboards or closets. No one seems to mind.

Count me out – It's bad enough that almost all haredim males are draft dodgers, but why don't the vast majority do at least some form of National Service such as working in hospitals, helping with the environment or working with the elderly – and why is there not any public outcry?

Liquid waste – Amid the worst water crisis in decades, public authorities resist rationing and local municipalities still water public parks in the middle of the day.

All talk, no action – Why in a land of widespread rip-offs, price gouging and poor post-sales service, are Israelis so incapable of flexing their consumer muscles and mounting boycotts?

The list is endless but I've run of space. I invite readers to send me their Israeli enigmas for use in a future column. Please send them to rsarner@netvision.net.il.

The great 'occupied territory' hoax

The term "Palestinian occupied territory" is one of the greatest hoaxes of all time. Daily terrorists attacks are justified in the name of this territory and its "liberation." And yet, there has never been any such place, except in the political mythology that dominates discussion of the Middle East. At no time in history did a sovereign entity known as Palestine exist, and at no time did the ancestors of the Palestinian Arabs have a state in any of this land.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In reality, there are two definitions of the "Palestinian occupied territories." Among themselves, the Arabs use this term to refer to the area between the Mediterranean and the Jordan River, including Israel. However, when talking to naïve Western journalists and diplomats, the term "occupied Palestine" is used to refer to the West Bank of the Jordan River and the Gaza Strip.

These areas have convoluted and complex histories. From the times of Joshua following the Exodus from Egypt, only the Jewish people had sovereignty of this land. For the last two thousand years, since the Roman conquest of Israel, the territory was under foreign occupation, including the British, who, in 1917, pledged to re-establish the Jewish National Home in this land. The initial area of the Mandate was divided in the 1920s, when Transjordan was given to the Hashemites. The remaining land was left for division between Jews and Arabs, and in 1947, the United Nations proposed the partition into two separate states.

While the Jewish leadership accepted partition and proclaimed the State of Israel, no claim was made for the creation of a "State of Palestine." Instead, the Arab states spearheaded an invasion to destroy the Jewish State. Israel survived, but the British-led Jordanian Army captured the areas between the Jordan River and Jerusalem (including the Old City), and this area became known as the West Bank. The Jordanians annexed this area, and ruled for 19 years, until the 1967 war.

Between the 1948 and 1967 wars, the Gaza Strip was controlled by Egypt, and, as in the case of the West Bank, served as a base for terrorist attacks against Israel. In Gaza, there was also was no suggestion of independent Palestinian control.

Control over both areas changed hands in 1967, when the territory was captured by Israel in a defensive war following Egyptian president Gamal Abdul Nasser's expulsion of United Nations buffer troops from the Sinai and other preparations for war. Israel struck first, and when the Jordanian army opened fire in the area of Jerusalem, the Israeli forces responded and captured the West Bank. This territory was not annexed (except for the parts of ancient Jerusalem that contained the ancient Jewish sacred sites) and continues to be disputed land, under international law.

After Arab leaders declared that they would never negotiate a peace treaty with Israel, state-owned lands that Jordan inherited from the British in 1948 and that Israel captured from Jordan in 1967 were opened for Jewish settlement. Throughout this period, there was no mention of Palestinian "territory" or the concept of a Palestinian state. The term "Palestinian" first appeared in the mid-1960s, and gained currency in the decade following the 1967 war.

As this brief history demonstrates, the claims that settlements are illegal, and the entire concept of "Palestinian occupied territory" are based on a political agenda. The pro-Arab majority in the UN repeated the mythology at every opportunity, and like other well-publicized and financed advertising campaigns, the slogan gained popularity and acceptance, even in Israel.

The campaign culminated in the 1993 Oslo agreement, which created the foundations for a Palestinian state as the cornerstone of a settlement of the conflict. Had this been Arafat's goal, he would achieved it during last year's Camp David summit. However, Arafat's blanket rejection of the Israeli proposals, and the effort to flood Israel with Arab "refugees" demonstrated that his goal continues to be the destruction of Israel, and not the creation of an independent state. Nevertheless, the myths are repeated around the world, allowing the terrorism in the name of Palestine to continue.

The Kirshner File

French Canadian scholar studies Quebec Jews

By any measure, Pierre Anctil is a pathbreaker, surveying and assessing terrain that is terra incognita to many of his fellow French Canadians. Anctil, who turned 49 last month, is a member of a small but growing band of French Canadian scholars who specialize in Quebec Jewish studies.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

"Pierre has succeeded in directing the attention of scholars, both Jewish and non-Jewish, to the great treasures of the Jewish community of Montreal's past that are 'buried' in Yiddish," explained his colleague, Ira Robinson, a professor of Judaic Studies at Concordia University in Montreal. "He has not merely translated a good deal of the material himself, he has also inspired translation of this material into English as well."

Anctil, said Seymour Mayne of the University of Ottawa, is one of the leading scholars of Yiddish culture in Canada.

Like an intrepid explorer, Anctil has taken it upon himself to study the cultural and historical riches of Quebec's Jews. Along with such notable figures as Jacques Langlais (Juifs et Quebecois francais, 200 ans d'histoire commune) and Esther Delisle (The Traitor and the Jews), he has trod where precious few French Canadians have ever ventured.

"Very modestly, I would say that I was among the first to recognize the importance of Jewish Montreal history in the general field of Quebec history," said Anctil. "It has become difficult today for Quebec historians not to study seriously the presence and contribution of the Montreal Jewish community to our society. I was also the first to translate Yiddish language memoirs and poetry into French and to reveal the existence of this literature to a larger francophone public."

In recognition of his achievements, the Canadian Jewish Congress honoured him with the 1998 Ezekiel Hart Prize, given every three years to a non-Jewish person who has made an outstanding contribution to inter-cultural relations in Quebec.

A social anthropologist whose command of Yiddish surprises and even flummoxes Jews, Anctil's interests range far and wide, from French-Jewish relations in Quebec and Yiddish literature in Montreal to the massive migration of Eastern European Jews to Canada from 1905 to 1914. In pursuit of these grand themes, Anctil, the former president of the Canadian Ethnic Studies Association, has translated several Yiddish works into French, with introductions and historical annotations.

Four years ago, he translated Le Montreal juif d'autrefois from the original 1947 Montreal fun Nekhtn by Israel Mendres. Earlier this year, Mendres' granddaughter, Vivian Felsen, translated it into English under the title of Montreal of Yesterday (Vehicule Press).

In 1999, Anctil published Le mouvement ouvrier juif au Canada, 1904-1920, Simon Belkin's 1956 account of the Jewish labour movement in Canada (Di Poale Zion Bavegung in Kanade).

Last year, it was Un demisiecle de vie yiddish a Montreal – taken from Hirsch Mendres' 1946 work, Mayn Lebns Rayze (A Half Century of Yiddish Life in Montreal) – and, in collaboration with Ira Robinson and Gerard Bouchard, Juifs et Canadiens francais dans la societe quebecoise (Jews and French Canadians in Quebec Society).

Currently, Anctil is working on two projects. He is completing a French translation of the second volume of Medres' memoirs, Tsvishn Velt Milkhomes, which, in French, has been rendered into Le Montreal juif entre les deux guerres. It will be published in the autumn. He is also finishing translations by David Rome of texts published in the early Montreal Yiddish press from 1907 to 1916. Until his death, Rome was director of the Jewish Public Library.

In addition, he is organizing two exhibits at the Montreal Museum of Archeology and History. The first, set for the summer of 2002, will focus on the history of Boulevard Saint-Laurent (The Main), a magnet for new immigrants, including Jews, since the late 1600s. The second, From King David to the Dead Sea Scrolls, A Thousand Years of Jewish History, is scheduled for the summer of 2003, and is based on the Israel Museum's archeological collection.

A graduate of Laval Unversity and the New School for Social Research, he was born in Quebec City on July 28, 1952. His father, Jean-Louis, was a civil servant in the ministry of defence. His mother, Constance Barry, was a housewife.

As a child, Anctil never met a Jew. "That happened only when I started travelling and studying at the university level."

Still, as he recalled, his family maintained friendly ties with a Jewish neighbour from a long-established Jewish family. "This man, Edward Joseph, was my grandfather's age. Relations between the Josephs and my family were good, but as far as I can remember, they rarely met on social occasions."

Curiously enough, the Anctil family tree has at least one Jewish bough. "My grandfather's cousin married a member of another branch of the Joseph family, but one who descended from a Jew who had converted to Catholicism in the middle of the 19th century. When I met this woman for the first time about 20 years ago, I soon saw that she knew very little about Judaism and truly belonged to the French Canadian cultural sphere."

A guest researcher at the Universite du Quebec, he was drawn to Jewish studies about 25 years ago. "It all began when I enrolled at the New School for Social Research in New York City to do a PhD in anthropology," said Anctil, who directed the French Canada Studies program at McGill University from 1988 to 1991.

Pierre Anctil

"I was interested in studying in a left-wing environment and chose the New School for that reason. I soon learned that it had been founded in 1933 by German Jews fleeing Hitler. That milieu left quite a mark on me. When I decided to settle in Montreal in 1978, I had already developed a sensitivity to Jewish issues. It was then a small step for me to become interested in the Montreal Jewish community."

From 1980 to 1988, he was a researcher at the Institut quebecois de recherche sur la culture, where he studied ethno-culture relations in Quebec, Montreal's Jewish community and francophone minorities in the United States.

In 1981, he met Rome, striking up a friendship with him. "He soon sensed that I had an interest in (Jewish studies), and pushed me in that direction. I soon realized that very few Francophones had approached the field of Canadian Jewish studies. I was intrigued by this fact. This was a domain that seemed quite innovative and likely to yield new historical and cultural information."

Anctil discovered that the field of Jewish-francophone relations in Quebec had not been well explored. "Many Jewish authors who dealt with the subject did so only superficially, and few consulted seriously francophone historical sources. Here was a chance to bridge the gap by bringing to the field a systematic knowledge of French Quebec that was clearly lacking. Any discipline is enriched when people from different backgrounds approach it. Jewish history is no exception. That francophones have become interested in Canadian Jewish history is a healthy sign."

He began studying Yiddish in 1984 at McGill. "I felt that a thorough examination of Montreal Jewish history could not be done without a mastery of it. So much material had been published in Yiddish in Montreal. I realized I could not remain indifferent to it. David Rome was also an important influence in my decision to learn Yiddish."

In fact, Anctil learned Hebrew before Yiddish. "Learning the Hebrew alphabet and certain religious terms helped me tremendously when I began studying Yiddish."

Like his father, Anctil is also a civil servant, being director of the department of inter-cultural relations in Quebec's ministry of citizenship and immigration. The job consists of formulating policy for inter-cultural relations and coordinating the struggle against discrimination and racism.

Anctil is reluctant to discuss Quebec's separatist movement, but says it has "very few truly Jewish angles." As he put it: "Almost nobody will vote for secession out of spite against the Jews of Montreal, or in an attempt to hurt them."

In his view, the vast majority of Jews will remain in Quebec should it secede. "I do not feel Jews should be scared of Quebec nationalism. As long as the process of independence rests on democratic principles, remains non-violent and Jewish voters have their say, it is difficult to find major faults with the sovereignty movement in that sense.

"One can always oppose an idea... but once the majority decides what the dominant current will be, there is no recourse but to let democracy lead the way. Should there be manifestations of anti-Semitism, then all Quebecois of all origins would, I hope, oppose them radically."

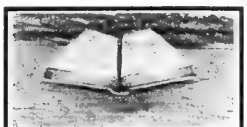
Jewish Life

The ethical issues in charity

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

Many people were embarrassed last year by the Jewish community's involvement in the Marc Rich pardon. In an op-ed article, former president Bill Clinton claimed that pressure from Israeli politicians and Jewish leaders led him to pardon Rich. Many thought the reason why these Jewish leaders campaigned for the pardon was because Rich had donated money to their organizations.



Rabbinic Reflections

Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of Reform Judaism's Union of American Hebrew Congregations, wrote in an op-ed piece in the New York-based Jewish Week: "I am in no position to judge Rich's legal claims, but neither are the many Jewish leaders and luminaries who contacted President Clinton in support of the pardon... Why their interest in a man who appears to have traded illegally not only with Iran but with Iraq and Libya, rogue states devoted to Israel's destruction? The answer is simple: They were bought... Rich contributed generously to Jewish causes and charities around the world, and then, in a carefully orchestrated campaign, called in favours to put pressure on the president."

While the facts in this case are complicated, if Yoffie's portrayal of this affair is correct, a serious breach of ethics has occurred.

How does one evaluate the Rich case from a halachic standpoint? Two key questions are: May one accept charity from a disreputable figure, and, can one accept charity that is given with ulterior motives?

Accepting Charity from Disreputable Figures

It is clear that stolen items cannot be used for ritual purposes or accepted by charities as gifts. The prophet Isaiah (61:8) writes, "for I the Lord love justice, and hate robbery with burnt offerings." The Talmud (Sukkah 30a) states that sacrifices and other ritual objects such as lulav and etrog are disqualified if they are stolen.

The Torah also makes it clear that objects acquired in a disreputable fashion (such as an object bartered for prostitution) carry a taint that makes them unacceptable for sacred use, such as writing a Torah (Deuteronomy 23:19; Shulchan Aruch OH 153:21). However, cash or any fungible asset that is earned from such disreputable activities could be used to acquire ritual objects.

There is another issue: accepting money from a mumar, a habitual sinner. The Talmud states that we do not accept sacrifices from a mumar (Hullin 5b). (Some say the term "mumar" refers to fundamentally immoral people who reject any sort of moral authority, while others say it includes any habitual sinner. See Yabiah Omer 1:YD 11.) It may be that the mumar is excluded from giving a sacrifice because we assume he is making it for ulterior motives (see Orchot Chaim II page 442) or because we view a mumar's money to be tainted (see Sefer Chasidim no. 938; cf. no. 687). Some apply this rule to include all types of charity, and say that we must always refuse a mumar's money (Rama, OH 154:1; YD 254:2). Others distinguish between ritual objects, such as items used in a synagogue, which because of their inherent holiness cannot be donated by a mumar, and charity that is distributed to the poor, which can be donated by a mumar (see Chatam Sofer, comment to Magen Avraham OH 154:18). Others limit this rule to sacrifices, and allow a mumar to give any type of charity (Shach YD 254:5; Magen Avraham OH 154:18). Indeed, some argue that charity should be accepted from all types of people, because it is important to encourage sinners to do good deeds (see Yabiah Omer 7: OH 22).

This debate has important implications for who should be accepted as a donor. A majority would accept charity from disreputable characters, not only because it might improve their behaviour, but also because of the practical value it would have. An important minority would reject charity from them, because the donation is tainted.

Another element in receiving charity from disreputable characters is the desecration of God's name (chillul Hashem). Any action that will diminish the reputation of a religious institution, and as a consequence, desecrate God's name, is absolutely forbidden (see Rambam Yesodei Hatorah 5:11). I would suggest that because of this concern, disreputable characters should be barred from giving "naming gifts," where a specific room or lecture is named after a donor.

Charity With Ulterior Motives

A similar question that arises out of the Rich case has to do with the motives with which he gave charity. One could argue that his motivation was not altruistic, and that he gave it primarily to clear his name, enlisting the help of Jewish leaders in his campaign for a pardon. Were Rich's donations, which were given for ulterior motives, allowed to be accepted by charitable organizations?

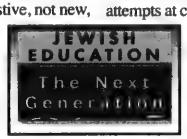
Jewish summer reading

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

For those wishing to catch up on their Jewish reading, I offer some summer samples. The selections are completely random, by no means exhaustive, not new, not easy reading, and come in no particular order (the list is therefore the very antithesis of the classic "summer reading" reviews that are printed every June in magazines and newspapers). I do not know if these make appropriate beach companions.



The Jew in the Lotus, by Rodger Kamenetz: This is Kamenetz's fluid and often insightful account of a meeting between the Dalai Lama and several Jewish leaders, which took place in October 1990.

The book has much to teach about Buddhism's attraction for Jews who have become alienated from their own tradition, and thus offers a window onto the current spiritual malaise of much of Jewry. As Kamenetz notes, "the materialism of much of Jewish life today, the lack of spirituality in our synagogue life, and the failure to communicate Judaism as a spiritual path have led, and will lead, many Jews to look elsewhere."

Genesis: The Beginning of Desire, by Aviva Zornberg: One of the more inspired attempts at creative analysis of ancient material to come along in many a day. Zornberg puts her Cambridge PhD in English into high gear and swirls a heady cocktail together of Midrash, Wallace Stevens, D.W. Winnicot and Rashi (among others) and shows the reader just what the myriad possibilities are for reading texts. I think this book puts to shame much of what passes for interesting Torah these days.

Nine Talmudic Readings, by Emmanuel Levinas: Also an example of inspired textual analysis, although Levinas is a bit "hit and miss" when it comes to getting it right with the Gemarah. Still, there are moments when this book is actually moving and even shocking in its ability to wring new life out of time-worn and seemingly abstruse passages.

On Repentance, by Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik: A book that bears not simply reading, but as is the fate of the best books, constant rereading. In its plainer moments, it can help illuminate the Jewish tradition's view on repentance and the process of Yom Kippur to create atonement. In its more elevated reaches, this book can change how one thinks and acts, and inspire the crucial process of forgiveness of self and other.

Better Living, by Mark Kingwell. Here I break the above pattern, as this book is not about Judaism, nor written by a Jew. The author teaches philosophy at the University of Toronto, and the book helps to clarify and often critique the cultural processes that are so endemic to the West at this point in time. From prozac to the Simpsons to the manipulation of advertising to the cult of "cool," Kingwell shows just how tenacious are the forces that are working on us all. This has implications for all Jews – and especially young people – who are attempting that ever so tricky balance between Judaism and secular culture. As Kingwell cautions, "easy solutions to hard questions are only easy at first glance; worse, they are not really solutions."

As the culture of reading is slowly overtaken by screens of one ilk or another, I applaud all those who still trouble over the printed word and care for its future.

On the power of prayer and Torah

The Way Into Jewish Prayer by Lawrence A. Hoffman Jewish Lights Publishing ; The Way Into Torah by Norman J. Cohen Jewish Lights Publishing.

Books
Bernard Baskin

According to a bit of humour that is making the rounds, when you pray these days, you're apt to get voice mail: "Thank you for calling heaven, please select one of the following options. Press 1 for requests. Press 2 for thanksgiving. Press 3 for complaints. Press 4 for all other inquiries."

But prayer isn't a laughing matter. A Chassidic master taught, "Do not laugh at one who moves his body, even violently, during prayer. If a man is drowning in a river, he makes all kinds of motions to try to save himself. This is not a time for others to laugh."

Rabbi Hoffman's book is an informative and inspiring exploration of three thousand years of Jewish worship. He asks: Why, where, how – and to whom - do Jews pray? His answers make up the core and heart of his search for meaning.

Prayer is often regarded as a form of begging or petition. But Jewish prayer includes thanksgiving, remorse, affirmation, expiation and aspiration. Properly understood prayer is more quest than request. It is, at its highest, a striving for moral improvement and the creation of a more righteous and perfect society.

The author writes eloquently about the power of prayer. "We can live in homes with nothing that is sacred, true and noble, or we can fill our lives with prayer and blessing at every turn. We can mark time only in secular birthday parties, wishing we were not getting any older, or we can repeat at each and every occasion, 'Blessed are You, [HaShem] our God, ruler of the universe, who has given us life, sustained us, and brought us to this season'."

Does God answer prayer? The author confesses that he doesn't know. But, in any case, he insists that prayer lets us "glimpse a world enhanced by the tiny acts of goodness that we are capable of, day in and day out. God may or may not answer prayer; but prayer is clearly a response to God. Prayer is the first step in the process by which we learn to matter."

Judaism provides prayers for all of life's experiences. When S. Y. Agnon went to Copenhagen to receive the Nobel Prize for literature, he spoke privately to the King. When questioned as to what he had said, Agnon explained, "I am a Jew. I have inherited many blessings from my ancestors, including one to be said in the presence of royalty. But I have never stood before a king or queen before. Finally, I got to say a blessing that has eluded me all these years: 'Blessed is God who shares divine glory with rulers of flesh and blood.'"

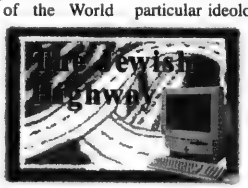
For Abraham Joshua Heschel, prayer is our humble answer to the inconceivable surprise of living.

In The Way Into Torah, Rabbi Cohen discusses the origin and development of the Hebrew Scriptures as well as rabbinic literature and indicates how they should be studied and understood. Filled with midrashic insights and practical instruction, this volume is a valuable and helpful guide.

Both authors are professors at the Hebrew Union College – Jewish Institute of Religion, and their books are part of a commendable publishing project concerned with Jewish faith, people and history that will eventually reach 14 volumes.

Racism conference

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ



Will it be 1975 all over again? That was when the UN passed the infamous "Zionism is racism" resolution. Now the question is being debated once again on the eve of the World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance [http://www.un.org/WCAR/]. The conference is scheduled to begin at the end of the month in Durban, South Africa, but concerns over a new "Zionism is racism" clause, and the use of the word "Holocaust" in the conference declaration have thrown the meeting's effectiveness into question.

Last month, in preparation for the conference, a draft declaration was released that has offended not only Israel but the United States, its European allies and UN Secretary General Kofi Annan. The Bush administration said it would boycott the meeting if Zionism language remains [http://www.gsnonweb.com/gsnlib_a/gsn2001/2001_07/20010730/104953.html]. To view excerpts from the conference's draft resolution, visit [http://www.racism.gov.za/substance/confdoc/decldraft189b.ht m].

Non-governmental organizations are also concerned about the resolution's wording. In a recent statement, Amnesty International said that the conference's important work might be derailed due to the controversy over Zionism. Amnesty says that it would be more productive if the conference recalled "the international obligations of states rather than address[ed] any particular ideology." As for the use of the word "Holocaust," the organization says that all genocides are equally reprehensible, but since the term "is widely understood to mean the racist genocide of the Jews during World War II, the controversy over this issue is insensitive to the feelings of survivors." Click on Racism-Media Briefing at their site to find this document [http://www.amnesty.org/].

Of course, this isn't the first time that Jewish and Israeli groups have faced opposition at the UN. Bonnie Lipton, national president of Hadassah, explains the difficulty – and ultimate success – her organization had being officially recognized by the United Nations Economic and Social Council [http://www.jewishaz.com/jewishnews/010518/zionism.shtml]. Since the UN's inception, Israel has been denied membership in the "Asian Regional Group," where it belongs geographically. Membership in a group is critical for countries to be nominated for important posts such as the Security Council. Israel's status changed last year when it was admitted as a member of the Western European and Others Group [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2000/06/04/Opinion/Editorial.7739.html].

The UN and Israel have a relationship that pre-dates the country's birth. For source documents, visit the Jewish Virtual Library, which has the complete text of over 400 hundred Middle East-related resolutions adopted by the General Assembly since 1947 [http://www.usisrael.org/jsource/UN/gatoc.html]. UNISPAL, the United Nations Information System on the Question of Palestine, is a database with over 3,000 documents, including all related General Assembly and Security resolutions [http://www.un.org/Depts/dpa/qpal/UNISPAL.htm].

The 1975 Resolution 3379, which stated that "Zionism is a form of racism and racial discrimination" [http://www.usisrael.org/jsource/UN/unga3379.html], was not overturned until 1991, when former U.S. president George Bush pressured the General Assembly to do so. The vote was 111-25, with 13 abstentions [http://www.aei.org/ct/ctbolton3.htm].

Before that crucial vote, however, Israel's ambassador to the UN, the late Chaim Herzog, addressed the UN [http://www.herzog.org.il/speech2.htm]: "For us, the Jewish people, this is but a passing episode in a rich and event filled history. We put our trust in our Providence, in our faith and beliefs, in our time-hallowed tradition, in our striving for social advance and human values, and in our people, wherever they may be. For us, the Jewish people, this resolution based on hatred, falsehood and arrogance, is devoid of any moral or legal value."

Web site lists Orthodox services worldwide

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — You want to take a holiday in Hawaii, but you have yahrzeit. Your boss sends you to Gothenburg, Sweden, even though you are saying kaddish. Or you want to visit your relatives in Australia, and you need to know where you can find Shabbat services.

Since May of this year, help has been out there, thanks to a new Web site, GoDaven.com. It lists shuls and other places Orthodox services are held, including addresses and phone numbers, times of services, both weekdays and weekends, whether the davening is Ashkenazi, Sephardi, or chassidic and even the rabbi or other contact person if it is available.

Information can be accessed by postal code, city (or part of a city, for instance Willowdale) or name.

There are also links to articles discussing the laws of davening and techniques to improve concentration, a discussion forum which allows site visitors to ask for minyan information, a bookstore and a form to submit information about their own minyan or ones that the user has discovered on his own.

GoDaven.com was created by Joseph (Yosi) Fishkin, chief resident of ophthalmology at New York University and the Manhattan Eye, Ear and Throat Hospital. He began the Web site when he realized that while Far Rockaway, New York, where he lives, has a great many minyanim, he had a hard time remembering which minyan started at what time. He began to keep a record on his Palm Pilot, but soon realized that others would like the information too.

"After searching the Internet, I was shocked to find that no truly comprehensive minyan database already existed. There are some that cover certain subgroups within Orthodoxy, some that cover certain geographic areas and some that provide only addresses, but no davening times."

Fishkin said that he made it user modifiable, so that people worldwide could easily submit the details of their own minyanim.

Considering where Fishkin himself lives, and also considering the huge Jewish population in New York, it is not surprising that the list is top-heavy with local entries, particularly in Brooklyn.

His hope is that as time goes on, there will be many more entries, so that "at some time in the forseeable future, if the site continues its current rate of growth, it will contain information about 99% of the world's [Orthodox] minyanim."

Entries range from Singapore to Australia to the United States, Israel, Canada, Argentina, Belarus, France, England and Mexico.

He said he would like to make the database search function more flexible, "so, for example, you can search for all nusach X minyanim located in City Y that have shacharit at Z o'clock."

Arla Klapman and Joseph Abitbol are pleased to announce their engagement. Proud parents are Barry Klapman and Janice Stern & Sara and Charles Abitbol.

A winter 2002 wedding is planned.

Pop goes teens' Web site

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Adam Gonshor and Michael Levine receive between 600 and 800 visitors a day.

The two Westmount Collegiate students are co-founders of www.andPOP.net, a pop music Web site featuring daily updated news, biographies, interviews, trivia, pictures and contests.

Gonshor, 18, and Levine, 17, who have been friends since kindergarten, started the site about one year ago because they wanted to combine their passion for music with Gonshor's interest in journalism and Levine's ability to design Web sites.

"It was a natural fit. We put up the site and started calling record companies and asking for interviews. Before we knew it, it was a going concern," says Gonshor.

When they first started up, he says, there were no updated music sites. "We obtain breaking news from various sites and link it to a central site."

So far, he says, they have interviewed such musicians as O-Town – their first major interview – soulDecision, Ricky J, Eden's Crush, Sugar Jones from the Canadian Pop Stars, and Chris Kirkpatrick from 'NSync.

"We find out a musician is coming and we call the record company, and ask about availability. About half the time we are able to secure an interview. Kirkpatrick was in town to promote a clothing line and he gave us a few minutes. We also covered the last Juno Awards in Hamilton."

Despite their age, says Gonshor, "we are taken seriously. We're not star struck. We look at it like a job. Sometimes we even ask them how our interview is going. We are always treated with respect."

Adam Gonshor and Michael Levine.

They carry articles by other teens as well. "If someone wants to contribute, we usually take the article. We put it up and give them full credit. They are not getting paid but they are getting experience and exposure."

They have not made a lot of money, says Gonshor, but "we have a company that sells ads for us and we have begun to make a profit.

"We're really not in it for the money, so anything we get is a bonus. We're happy to be meeting celebrities and to be doing what we do.

"We're looking forward to interviewing both the Backstreet Boys and Boyz 2 Men one day. If we could get any interview we want, I think it would be Michael Jackson. Just being able to get the interview would be newsworthy."

Ethical issues in charity

It is acceptable to give charity in order to enlist God's favour (Pesachim 8a), but there are medieval sources who strongly condemn the giving of charity for the sake of fame and glory (Beit Yoseph YD 247, in the name of the Semag). According to this view, charity that leads to arrogance is a sin.

Because of this injunction, one could argue that publicizing the identities of donors and the size of their gifts (a component of most fundraising campaigns) should be forbidden. In fact, this argument was made in 1867 by Elazer Dov Ettenzesser, who, concerned with this common practice of the time, wrote to several prominent German rabbis asking for it to be stopped. Rabbi Ezriel Hildesheimer (YD I: 219), however, defended the practice, arguing that giving charity with the hope of publicity does not necessarily mean that one is looking for glory, and that it is impossible to be certain what the motives of a donor are. In addition, he was willing to accept the imperfect system for the sake of increasing charitable revenue. His view – that an organization is allowed to accept charity whatever the motive – is the current custom.

The Rich case underlines the complexity of receiving charity from less than reputable individuals. While there is a solid halachic basis for organizations to accept such gifts, there is an additional imperative that such donations must be carefully assessed to make certain they do not corrupt or taint those organizations. They also should have an impartial outsider review their actions, because one's moral vision is easily distorted by a large donation.

Displaced Persons – Berger's way

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

In Displaced Persons, a young family arrives in New York from Berlin on Purim 1950 and begins their journey into the American mainstream.

But Joseph Berger's engrossing story really begins with his father and mother in prewar Galicia and Otwock, Poland.

Towards the beginning of his novel, Berger tells us that his mother, Rachel, "was shaped in large part by the years before the war." The harshness of those years in Otwock, a shtetl just a short distance from Warsaw, is described through interviews and a memoir that Rachel gives her son.

Dutiful and severe relationships in poor family surroundings form Rachel's character. She becomes a woman whose drive and intelligence direct her toward survival in Warsaw, through the war years in Russia, and then toward success in the United States.

The more difficult challenge for Berger is in telling the story of his father, Marcus. We know that he was born a peasant in a farming family in Galicia, where Poland, Slovakia, the Ukraine, Hungary and Romania all meet.

Very little other than that is told, yet Marcus's unassuming and devoted nature comes through clearly in the simple descriptions of his presence around the family.

Throughout the novel, we are also aware of Marcus's overwhelming loneliness.

The ambiguity in Berger's relationship with his father is continued in Displaced Persons with the descriptions of the interactions between his parents. At one point, they are eating their Sunday morning ritual feast of rye bread, slices of egg, herring, radish and onion.

"Somehow," Berger writes, "as they devoured their sandwiches... my parents seemed friendlier to each other, funnier, their ribbing less biting."

On another occasion, Berger tells us his father chose America over Israel because of an uncle who had occasionally sent money to his family in Europe. Rachel had preferred Israel over America.

Marcus's tragic disappointment, upon his discovery that his only American relative is in fact dead, is described with the reminder that Rachel would "surely remind him how foolish he had been."

With just a few anecdotes, it seems apparent that his parents' relationship was defined by coldness and quarrels. But of this, again, not much is told.

Berger notes that he often compared his arrival in America from the displaced persons camp in Germany with the deliverance of the Jews from the tyranny of Haman in Persia. However, the novel describes much more than a journey away from Eastern-European anti-Semitism. It also explores Berger's personal struggle in blending into American culture while feeling embarrassed by, as he puts it, "the Yiddish on his parents' lips."

Everyone has their own story, their own prism through which they see their world. Berger's view of the world is through the eyes of a refugee defined by survivor parents. His story, which he tells with detail and ease, is filled with real and sympathetic characters. We are left with an unforgettable sense of time and place. Yet it leaves us wanting more.

While at a staff meeting at the New York Times, Berger found himself drawn back to his childhood by a seeded roll which he has brought for breakfast. He tells us that like Swann in Proust's novel, À la recherche du temps perdu, a memory draws him back to his youth.

But unlike Proust, whose eight-volume work leaves little unsaid, the depth of some of Berger's characters remain unexplored.

It is fitting that a young boy who arrives in New York on Purim only partially removes his mask, not quite revealing his inner self.

As a student, Berger worked at his university newspaper. He tells us that when he looks back at those years, he realizes that "there were limits, after all, to what I could say about my family."

That was a mistake, Berger says, because "it turned out that several of my campus friends... were children of refugees... We might have given us something more meaningful to chew over [and] drawn even closer."

For Berger, some of those limits remain.

ש'שאר ע'נינו

גידי קורן וחברים

חברי שמחה שלח לי את החגיג הבא:

"חיים בישראל חם כמו קפה:
או שחם בבוץ,
או שחכל שחור,
או שחכל חפוך,
או שפשוט קורה נס....."

נשיאת ארה"ב הראשונה

Beth Tzedec embarks on new 'STAR Tech'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum's participation in a pilot program involving synagogue transformation through technology has nothing to do with any computer expertise on his part, nor does it reflect any advanced technological standing on the part of Beth Tzedec Congregation (although the synagogue does have a Web site).

On the contrary, the rabbi explained in a recent interview. The project was initiated because of a feeling that "synagogues are woefully lacking. They're trying to assist us to catch up."

The STAR Tech project, a one-year pilot program, is an initiative of STAR (Synagogue Transformation and Renewal), the partnership formed in December 1999 by philanthropists Edgar Bronfman, Michael Steinhardt and the late Charles Schusterman.

Rabbi Tanenbaum is the only Canadian among a group of 20 rabbis participating in the project as rabbinic consultants. The others are from the United States.

He is also involved in STAR through Beth Tzedec's new Jewish Personal Trainer program, which matches lay people as mentors and trainees in a variety of areas of Jewish knowledge and practice. The program, a brainchild of Rabbi Tanenbaum's, received a STAR grant earlier this year.

The 20 congregational rabbis in the technology project were chosen from more than 200 applicants and represent a range of denominational affiliations. They have received online business training and met three months ago for the first of three in-person sessions.

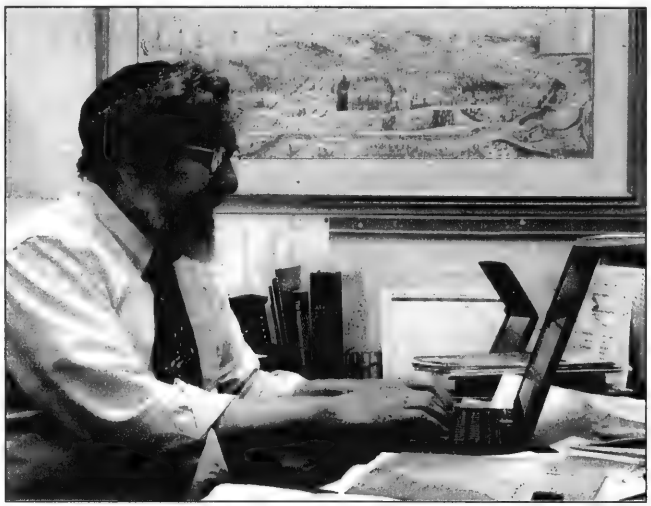
Most of their contact, however, will be via technology. The program has provided each rabbi with some $4,000 worth of equipment including a Dell Inspiron laptop computer with "all the bells and whistles" and a hand-held device with capacity for sound recording and instant messaging (although the latter technology is not currently available in Toronto).

"This laptop has more power than those mainframe computers that used to fill a whole room," Rabbi Tanenbaum said animatedly, recalling his days as a rabbinical student in the 1960s when he co-wrote a language transliteration program enabling computers to print Hebrew without first having to be shut down and rebooted.

"We hope these advanced technological tools will do much more than simply enable the members of our advisory team to participate in our project," said STAR president Lynn Schusterman (Charles Schusterman's widow), in a news release. "We want the technology to stimulate the rabbis to begin thinking about innovative ways to renew themselves, to transform their congregations and to reach out to the unaffiliated Jews in the communities they serve."

STAR has brought the role of the synagogue to the forefront, reflecting a growing realization, Rabbi Tanenbaum explained, of the importance of the synagogue in offering Jewish core values, a sense of cohesiveness and continuity.

Among the proposals Rabbi Tanenbaum is working on, that originated with STAR, is the concept of educating via the Internet. Although there are "wonderful" Jewish sites online, the rabbi said, there is a lack of the sense of community one would find in a local synagogue.



Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum

"How can we learn to deliver to our own congregants the same quality education that we're able to deliver in a lecture that can't necessarily be attended [and at the same time] have that sense that this is Beth Tzedec and this is Toronto and this is our community?

"One of the things Beth Tzedec might perhaps be able to do is discuss how we might go about achieving that."

Through streaming video, the synagogue would be able to provide lectures over the Internet to be viewed live, or later, at a more convenient time.

Other implications of STAR Tech, for Beth Tzedec, include the probable revamping of some synagogue programs as a result of the online courses. An integrated, interactive Web site is also an exciting prospect, Rabbi Tanenbaum said.

"STAR has introduced us to resources I didn't know existed."

Other technology-oriented programs in the works at STAR include the creation of an online synagogue "supersite" as a resource for Jewish institutions.

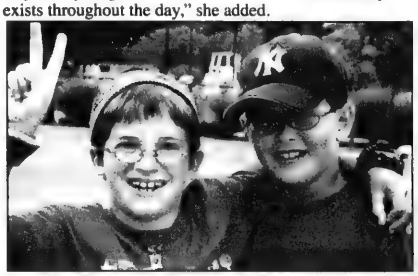
Centre Camp's full of spirit

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Kids in braids, pigtails, kippot and baseball caps gather at the flagpole with their blue backpacks every morning.

"Camp spirit begins at Centre Camp first thing in the morning," said Janis Roth, director of community and family services at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC).

"Since many of the councillors were campers here when they were younger, there is an incredible sense of family that exists throughout the day," she added.



Zvi and Stefan.

The camp, located at the BJCC, draws children from the entire community, said camp director, Jeff Krupski.

Roth noted that while some of the kids have an extensive Jewish background, for others it is their first time learning Jewish traditions – from making challah covers in arts and crafts to learning Hebrew songs and celebrating oneg Shabbats.

The camp integrates children from all parts of our community, Krupski said – there are Russian, Israeli, South American, Sephardi and Ashkenazi kids.

"The camp is a full integration camp and we've met the needs of disabled children with great success," Roth added.

Known as Mr. K. during the school year at Bialik Hebrew Day School where he teaches, Krupski is called Jeff at Centre Camp. He began Centre Camp's sports specialty program in 1997 and has watched the camp grow over the years – in numbers, as well as in facilities.

"One of the camp's most well-known secrets is that the campgrounds have been renovated," Roth said. There is a baseball diamond, beach volleyball, basketball and tennis courts, soccer field, an in-line skating rink and low ropes course. There are also two swimming pools – indoor and outdoor.

"And now we're expanding trails into the back for extreme hiking," Roth said.

Nicole, Daniel and Michelle (counsellor).

Centre Camp also offers a performing arts specialty camp for kids between grades 2 to 6.

Beginning as early as 2½, kids can stay until they're 15 years old, when they do councillor-in-training programs. There are full fee kids, as well as limited places for campers on subsidies.

"In many ways, camp is a great equalizer," Roth said. "Everyone here is treated the same."

"The camp now has over 850 campers registered for the summer," Roth said. "However, our success lies not only in our growth, "but in the fact that the kids keep coming back."

For August registration information, call 416-636-1880, ext. 378.

A New Solution To The Homecare Problem

Finally... Employers Can Watch Video Interviews On The Internet

Ontario's homecare system is in crisis warned a PriceWaterhouseCoopers report commissioned by the health ministry and published in July.

In Ontario, 30,000 are currently on waiting lists for homecare. In Toronto there are 8000 people waiting for placement in a nursing home. Ontario's long-term healthcare facilities recently ranked last in an international comparison.

Critical shortage of healthcare professionals

Many Canadian families are now turning to private homecare as the only viable alternative. However, the critical shortage of healthcare and childcare professionals means that it is becoming increasingly difficult to find Canadian nannies, nurses and caregivers willing to work on a live-in basis. Those that do often charge high fees.

A cost-effective, long-term solution : foreign live-in caregivers

Caregivers.ca, an innovative online homecare agency, has developed a cost-effective, long-term solution to this problem: foreign live-in caregivers. The government's Live-In Caregiver Program allows Caregivers.ca to find many qualified nurses, nannies, therapists and even doctors from overseas to come to Canada to work as live-in caregivers with Canadian families.

Caregivers.ca finds caregivers abroad and uses cutting-edge internet technology to match them with Canadian families.

Unique searchable database of caregiver resumes and video interviews

The Caregivers.ca web site(www.caregivers.ca) has a unique, searchable online database of thousands of caregiver resumes and instantly viewable video interviews.

Once employers have found their prospective candidates online, Caregivers.ca can then set up telephone interviews. This is a revolution in the employment recruiting industry. Videos let employers see who caregivers really are.

Caregivers starting at $200 per week

It doesn't take very long to bring a foreign caregiver to Canada, and it's well worth the wait: foreign caregivers are willing to work for less – starting at $200 per week – because they have been given the opportunity to come to Canada, and to apply for permanent residence after working in the country for two years.

Employers can save thousands of dollars a year by hiring a full-time foreign live-in caregiver and get better care – an affordable alternative to expensive hospitals, care facilities and Canadian caregivers. For employers who need immediate help, Caregivers.ca can provide temporary Canadian caregivers until foreign caregivers arrive.

Rosenblatt Associates, one of Canada's largest immigration law firms, established Caregivers.ca. Together, they have 80 + offices worldwide (including many throughout the Philippines, the most popular source country for foreign caregivers), and provide full-service international employment recruiting, including background checks.

Caregivers.ca finds and places foreign caregivers; all the immigration matters are handled by Rosenblatt Associates.

Caregivers.ca is revolutionizing the search for quality and affordable homecare.

Community kitchen on the agenda in Vancouver to help fight poverty

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A coalition of Vancouver organizations has identified the need for a Jewish community kitchen where individuals can meet regularly to cook healthy, nutritious and economical meals.

Hand in Hand: A Coalition on Poverty in the Jewish Community sprang from a poverty forum held in January. Its first event – a community picnic held recently at Or Shalom Synagogue – gave participants the opportunity to have a say in the start-up of a community kitchen and also help prepare food and leave with some homemade, vegetarian dishes.

"The bottom line is that it's all about community building and strengthening roots," said David Berson, Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver's director of community planning. "It's a real, live story about people coming together and making the community more accessible and more affordable."

A combined effort of about 18 local organizations, the coalition has several goals, explained Berson. The first is to get a dialogue between different sectors of the population to deal with the denial of poverty within the Jewish community.

Other objectives include reaching lower income people who may or may not be involved in the community and enlisting synagogues to provide a certain portion of free seats for High Holy Day services and free tickets to community events for those in need.

"The actual picnic itself was meant to be a consumer input forum where people can come and express their interests, needs and concerns in terms of participating in a Jewish community kitchen.

"We had about 50 to 60 people, so there's quite a good sense of interest," he said. "We hope that, within six months to a year, we have a couple of kitchens in place."

A remarkable community response and several initiatives have resulted from the whole poverty forum initiative, he added.

"For example, the council of presidents of Jewish organizations said that organizations holding non-fundraising events would make free tickets available – something like five to eight percent for those under low incomes, and a community garden has been started."

Lani Levine, the coalition's chair, emphasized the importance of reaching out to people who are not necessarily involved with the community at the moment.

She also added that the group is not attempting to provide programming, which is being handled by Jewish Family Services, but rather to identify areas of need and co-ordinate in an organized fashion so that each different organization involved with the coalition knows what the other is doing.

"We're trying to find the holes and fit the pieces," Levine said. "We're not trying to take on the programming, but work hand-in-hand with the agencies who do what they do and know what they're doing best."

At the picnic, participants had an opportunity to cook at one of four stations – making either hummus, Israeli salad, carrot salad or vegetarian chili. They also heard about the concept of a community kitchen and were able to express ideas as to what they felt would work best for the community.

"We've always taken the approach that this shouldn't be a talk-down initiative," Levine said. "We need to involve people who need the services in designing the services. We don't want to tell people what they need. We want them to tell us what they need."

Berson said it was evident that participants felt empowered throughout the afternoon's event. "They weren't just having things given to them – they were hands-on cooking and being asked for their input."

Ozarow cemetery being restored in Poland

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Ozarow cemetery, one of the few remaining Jewish cemeteries in Poland and dating back almost 400 years, is being restored after years of neglect through a group called the Ozarow Cemetery Restoration Project (OCRP), which was formed this past May.

Scenes of Ozarow cemetery.

With some 100 monuments still standing, the cemetery is a solemn testimony to Ozarow's once thriving Jewish community. Ozarow is located in southeastern Poland, near Ostrowiec and 80 km from Kielce.

In 1939, 4,284 Jews lived there. At the time of the ghetto's liquidation in 1942, the Jewish population totaled approximately 8,000. Today, there are no Jews left.

The cemetery, in which such famous rabbis as the disciples of the 16th-century kabbalist, Rabbi Yitzhak Luria, and the third rebbe of Ozarow, Rabbi Leibush Epstein, are interred, was almost completely destroyed during World War II. Many of its monuments were taken by the Germans to fortify the Wistula River about 15 km from the Polish city. (People from the neighbourhood, however, did not steal the stones because, according to legend, they were cursed.)

OCRP project co-ordinators are Rabbi Tanchum Becker of Israel, Norman Weinberg and Mark Milgrom of the United States, Marek Lipsztajn of Canada and Stefan Andrzej Omasta of Poland. Recently, Omasta found aerial photographs of the cemetery walls taken before World War II. He also found in Sandomierz, not far from Krakow, documentation written in 1978 in Polish by a well-known Polish historian, Adam Penkalla. The 130-page manuscript, which contains the history and architecture of the cemetery, as well as other relevant information, will be translated and made available to the OCRP.

Hartley Garshowitz of Toronto, whose maternal grandparents, Joseph and Rose Mandel, were from Ozarow and came to Canada in 1926, says that the renovation includes cleaning the cemetery, building a wall which incorporates all the remains of the old wall, erecting a commemorative monument and placing a descriptive plaque at the gate in three languages – English, Polish and Hebrew.

The plaque at the entrance will describe the history of the site and acknowledge the contribution of those who have supported the project, including the mayor of Ozarow, Marcin Majcher; the local Catholic priest, Father Stanislaw Szczerek; the Ozarower Rebbe Tanchum Becker, who now lives in Israel; and members of Polish Jewish groups, including the Ozarowers and Descendants and the Jewish Historical Institute Association in Warsaw.

A dedication ceremony will take place in Ozarow on Oct. 15, 2001. As well, a group tour has been arranged from Sunday, Oct. 14 to Sunday, Oct 21. A tour bus and guide have been arranged to take the group from Warsaw to Ozarow, and then continue for a further week of sightseeing in various towns of Jewish interest including Krakow and Sandomierz.

Garshowitz is hoping to reach not only Ozarowers, but also many Canadians whose families came from the Polish city. He also expects government dignitaries from Poland and abroad, rabbis, priests, Polish media and a filming crew to attend the event.

For more information or to register for the tour, contact Weinberg (phone or fax: 716-688-5272; e-mail: tourinfo@ozarow.org), or Garshowitz (phone: 905-731-9268 or e-mail: hushyg@home.com). You can also visit the Ozarow Web site at www.ozarow.org.

Keren Hayesod chair reaches out to 'forgotten Jews'

BY JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Harvey Wolfe

MONTREAL — In June, Harvey Wolfe led an eight-member Canadian delegation to Russia's remote far east, seeing first-hand the bleak living conditions of the area's Jews, who have largely been forgotten by the West.

The itinerary included Khabarovsk, Kamchatka, Vladivostok and Birobidzhan, which Stalin established as a Jewish autonomous republic. Many of the Jews there are poor, lacking such basics as adequate housing and med-icine.

They continue to live in the spiritual void created by communism; the Jewish religious revival evident in the large cities of the western part of the former Soviet Union, has not reached this region. Not one synagogue is functioning.

Yet Wolfe found a determination among them to rediscover their Jewish roots and rebuild a community.

Wolfe, as the new chair of Keren Hayesod's world board of trustees, expects to spend much of his two-year mandate searching out Jews in distress wherever they live and reminding them that Israel is ready to welcome them at anytime.

Since its founding in 1920, Keren Hayesod (also known as United Israel Appeal) has been the fund-raising arm of the Zionist movement's social development of the Jewish homeland.

Working in partnership with the Jewish Agency, the Keren Hayesod has brought 2.3 million immigrants to Israel and eased their integration. It has sponsored Jewish education and the basic necessities for many thousands more who live in areas of oppression or war or economic deprivation. It is also on the scene after natural disasters, like the recent earthquake in Turkey or flood in Venezuela.

In the Russian far east, the Jewish Agency had been working there only six years. With the Joint Distribution Committee, they have established Hebrew classes and encouraged aliyah, as well as opening soup kitchens.

One idea to come out of the Canadian delegation's trip is to set up summer camps for children to teach them the basics of Judaism.

Today, 90 campaigns in 50 countries on five continents are affiliated with Keren Hayesod. Only the United States, which by far raises the most money (60 percent of the worldwide total), remains separate from Keren Hayesod as the United Jewish Communities.

Among Keren Hayesod countries, Canada raises the most money, and that explains the fact that three of the last five of its world chairs have been Canadians – Julie Koschitzky and Phil Granovsky, both of Toronto, came before Wolfe.

Wolfe has a long history of Jewish community and Zionist activity. He was president of FEDERATION CJA from 1991-91 and general chair of the 1995 Combined Jewish Appeal.

The following year, he became president of UIA Canada, overseeing its merger with the Council of Jewish Federations into UIA Federations Canada in 1998, and served as the new organization's first president. He also is a member of the Jewish Agency board of governors, and chairs its budget and finance committee for the former Soviet Union.

He may serve as Keren Hayesod world chair for up to four years.

Wolfe, an architect, sees his biggest challenge as getting through to Diaspora Jews that Israel is in a "crisis" because of the intifadah and terrorism that continue within its borders.

An increasing percentage of Israel's budget is being diverted for security and it is up to the Diaspora to ensure that the humanitarian work of the Jewish Agency is carried on, he said. "Not one penny" raised by UIA goes to the Israeli government, he added.

In addition to aliyah and klitah, Keren Hayesod improves the quality of life in the peripheral regions, the Galilee and Negev, and brings young people to Israel for visits.

"In Canada today, only about 21-22 percent of the money raised in the local campaigns goes to Israel. At one time, it was 50 percent. In many other Keren Hayesod countries, all the money raised goes to Israel," he said.

Wolfe "lays no blame" for communities increasing their local spending during a period when Israel was enjoying relative prosperity and peace. He hopes that they will now recognize those times are over, and Israel must again be the priority.

Almost every community around the free world is expected to take part in "solidarity" rallies with Israel on Sept. 23, he said, and "parallel" campaigns for Israel's urgent needs will be held in conjunction with the regular appeal this fall.

Diaspora Jews can also help Israel by simply going there at this time. It will boost the suffering tourism industry and the morale of besieged Israelis, Wolfe said.

"Four or five years ago, you might have felt just like another tourist in Israel. Today, Israelis will thank you for coming," he said.

Orthodox object to empty mezuzot at Y

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The YM-YWHA is in hot water with Jewish religious authorities for affixing mezuzot throughout its newly renovated premises that have no parchment inside and are therefore passul, or invalid.

The presence of these empty casings appears to have come to light only after a complaint was made to The CJN by a user of the Y, who said he had found a few in this condition on interior doorposts.

Y executive director Joe Rabinovitch acknowledged, when asked by The CJN, that this was true, but explained that it was "a temporary situation."

Rabinovitch said the Y's associate executive director Jacob Haimovici is currently on vacation in Israel and is buying the parchments there. "All the parchments will be [installed] in a couple of weeks," he said.

He noted that Haimovici is Orthodox and said he has "confidence in what he is doing."

Rabinovitch admitted he did not know that installing empty mezuzot was a serious violation of Halachah.

The reason the casings were put up without the parchments, Rabinovitch said, was that a workman was available on a particular day to do the job, which requires some skill. In some cases, they had to be screwed into concrete or brick. "If we didn't do it that day, who knows when we could get someone to do it?"

Rabinovitch said there was "no intent" to deceive anyone.

Over the past three years, the Y has been undergoing an $18-million renovation and expansion, but has remained open throughout.

Asked whether it was not a breach of trust for a Jewish institution to install non-kosher mezuzot, Rabinovitch said, "I don't know anything about that." Mezuzot are touched or kissed by some people as they pass through a door to show reverence for the Torah passages they believe are encased within.

The hot dog-days of summer

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

It's funny how every year, as we approach the dog-days of summer, things on the political front heat up. Already, the various parties (and wannabe parties) are jockeying for position in anticipation of a contentious session in the House come September. Don Boudria has warned that there will be no easy ride for the once-Reform-then-Alliance-now-Limbo-rebels.

The "Strahl Strategy," to form a recognized caucus in the House and enjoy the privileges that recognition confers, seems to be floundering. In fact, for a clever bunch of individuals, it seems that the "rebels with a cause" are in deep trouble. Support back home is lower for them than it is for the Alliance (which is to say, it's pretty low!) and there seems to be general media weariness with covering the story (the rebels' strongest suit in their attempt to oust Stockwell Day). It can be pretty much summed up by the hilarious image of rebel MP Jim Pankiw's defence of the call to give them party status.

Pankiw is the MP who tabled a private member's bill in the House (before he bolted the Alliance) to raise the party status threshold to a minimum of 30 seats. This was done in a bid to address the danger of "fringe" parties like the Tories and NDP who, with 12 seats, represent only a tiny fraction of the country (four percent). Now that he is on the other side of the issue, Pankiw is vague about how he can reconcile the two seemingly contradictory positions. Good luck, Jim!

But the rebels are not the only ones feeling the heat of summer. As we have had occasion to observe in the past, every statement and move by a Liberal leadership aspirant has to be seen through the prism of the all-consuming "race-that-isn't."

Hence, Alan Rock came to the immediate defence of have-not Atlantic provinces who had been lambasted by Ontario Premier Mike Harris for always wanting more and more in equalization payments. This helped Rock consolidate his lead in Atlantic Canada – much to the chagrin of Brian Tobin, who is doing some floundering of his own. Not to be outdone on the national scene, however, the front-runner Paul Martin took his own shots at Harris regarding Harris' demand that Ottawa pony up 50 percent of the cost of all new health care expenditures. Poor Mike seems to be getting it from all sides.

But Harris may have the last laugh. As of this writing, the first ministers conference in B.C. promises to be quite an affair, and Harris is the clear leader of a combative bunch of premiers. Next week, we'll look at some of the winners and losers as well as some possible implications for the Jewish community, so stayed tuned!

EU presses Israel to be more flexible on intifadah

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BRUSSELS — The European Union is pressing Israel to drop its insistence on a total halt to Palestinian violence before the two sides begin steps to resume peace talks, EU officials said last week.

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana sought to convince the Israelis and the United States in intensive telephone diplomacy last week that a threadbare ceasefire could otherwise collapse, raising the danger of a wider Middle East conflict.

The officials said Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell seemed amenable to a more flexible interpretation of the so-called Mitchell Commission proposals for a phased return to the negotiating table. But Prime Minister Ariel Sharon remained inflexible in demanding a one-week cessation in all Palestinian attacks and insisting Israel would be sole judge of when conditions were right to move to a cooling-off period.

A panel headed by former U.S. senator George Mitchell, and including Solana, called in May for a ceasefire, followed by an extended cooling-off period, confidence-building measures and the resumption of peace talks. But an EU official close to Solana said: "To insist on zero violence before the cooling-off period is absurd. It means you have to be in the freezer before you can enter the cooler."

"You have to accept some level of violence, otherwise you give the key to extremists who can cut off the process at any time," the official said.

Another EU diplomat said Sharon's stance suggested he meant to delay or evade implementing the Mitchell report's other recommendations, notably a complete freeze on Israeli settlement building in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

International efforts to salvage the ceasefire intensified after an Israeli missile attack on an office of the militant Islamic movement Hamas in the West Bank city of Nablus last Tuesday killed eight people, including two senior Hamas political leaders.

U.S. Central Intelligence Agency director George Tenet brokered a cease-fire agreement in June but it has been breached repeatedly by both sides.

"It's crazy when the Israelis claim that their assassinations don't violate the ceasefire but the Palestinian street violence they provoke does," the EU diplomat said.

Some EU diplomats said recent Israeli actions raised the question of whether Sharon actually wanted a cease-fire or sought to goad the Palestinians into a reaction that would justify a massive Israeli strike against the Palestinian Authority. In an apparent bid to head off revenge attacks, PA Chairman Yasser Arafat called last week for a halt to all violence in the Middle East and appealed again for international observers, which Israel has rejected.

The EU, long suspected by Israel of pro-Palestinian bias, has increasingly taken a role alongside the United States in Middle East diplomacy, especially since President George W. Bush has scaled back Washington's active involvement.

Sharon: New approach needed for reaching agreement with PA

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel will need to try a new approach in order to reach agreements with the Palestinians, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said last week.

The current situation, he said, "requires a different approach than the one we have tried until now in contacts with the Palestinians. This [new] approach is based on a process of gradual progress on the basis of long-term interim agreements for non-belligerency."

Speaking to graduates of the National Security College in Glilot, Sharon said, "Our relationship with our neighbours will be based on a combination of mutual dependence, deterrence and national economic interests, through which it will be possible to examine the development of the relationship."

Regarding the current conflict, Sharon said he is certain "we can look forward with optimism," and that Israel "can survive this battle and win."

"I remember more difficult situations," he said, "situations in which everyone had lost hope, situations which some described as the destruction of the Third Temple."

U.S. senators launch campaign for kidnapped soldiers

By NATAN GUTTMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — With U.S. senators John McCain and Joseph Biden at his side, along with relatives of four Israelis held by the Hezbollah since last October, Knesset speaker Avrum Burg last week launched an international campaign for parliaments to sign a treaty that calls on Hezbollah to treat its four hostages according to the rule of international law, allow them visits and provide information about their condition.

McCain, who ran for the Republican nomination for president last year and was a prisoner of war in Vietnam for five years, told the relatives of the kidnapped soldiers that the hardest thing for him while in captivity was the thought of what his family was going through.

McCain and Biden promised they would seek a congressional declaration calling for the kidnapped soldiers to be treated according to international law.

Burg said this was the first step in the international parliamentary campaign.

On Sunday, a Knesset delegation went to Latin America to visit 30 parliaments seeking similar declarations. This is to be followed by a swing through European parliaments.

The campaign will also include lobbying to prevent Syria from becoming a member of the UN Security Council because of Damascus' patronage of the Hezbollah.

Haim Avraham, father of Benny, one of the captured soldiers, said the main thing the families want is to get information about their children.

Opinion

Israel on diplomatic defensive

By JESSICA STEINBERG
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

With Prime Minister Ariel Sharon facing a potential war crimes lawsuit in Belgium, and Denmark calling for the arrest of Israel's ambassador-designate, Israel is beginning to feel like the most unpopular kid on the block.

After years of improved international standing following the signing of the Oslo peace accord with the PLO in 1993, the Jewish State finds itself on the diplomatic defensive once again as the peace process unravels.

In addition to the charges against Sharon and the uproar in Denmark, Israel's Foreign Ministry is preparing a list of countries where Israeli officials could be put on trial for their roles in defending the country, and the international conference on racism that is to begin Aug. 31 may become a forum for some of the most intensely anti-Israel resolutions in years.

The lawsuit in Belgium was filed in June by several Palestinian survivors of the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacre in Lebanon. The massacre was carried out by Lebanese Christian militiamen who were allies of the Israeli army during the Lebanon War.

An Israeli commission of inquiry found Sharon indirectly responsible for Sabra and Shatila because, as defence minister overseeing the Israeli invasion, he failed to foresee and prevent the massacre. Sharon was forced to resign from the Defence Ministry, though he stayed in the cabinet as a minister without portfolio and served in various posts in subsequent Likud governments.

The lawsuit was brought in Belgium because it has a 1993 law on "universal jurisdiction" – the authority to prosecute foreigners for crimes against humanity, torture or war crimes, even if committed elsewhere.

The charges against Sharon are now being investigated by a Belgian court, which will decide whether to press formal charges. In the meantime, the Israeli government has hired a Belgian lawyer for him.

In Denmark, Israel's appointment of Carmi Gillon – a former head of the Shin Bet domestic security service, as well as the Peres Centre for Peace – as ambassador has created a diplomatic storm.

Israel's nomination of Gillon sparked outrage in Denmark because he has admitted authorizing the torture of Palestinian suspects when he led Israel's Shin Bet domestic security service between 1994 and 1996. Gillon later went on to become president of Foreign Minister Shimon Peres' Tel Aviv peace centre, which fosters co-operation between Jews and Arabs.

Despite the threat, Israel said it would send Gillon to Denmark.

Jensen later backtracked, saying Gillon could not be arrested because he would have diplomatic immunity in Denmark.

Now, most Danish political parties are calling for Gillon's resignation. That includes two Danish politicians – one of them Arne Melchior, a relative of Israel's deputy foreign minister, Michael Melchior. The two politicians are considered Israel's most loyal supporters in Scandinavia.

It was an Israeli human rights organization, B'Tselem, that appealed initially to the Israeli and Danish foreign ministries to cancel Gillon's appointment.

As Sharon and Gillon deal with their respective troubles, Israel's Foreign Ministry is drawing up a list of countries that have universal jurisdiction laws on their books.

"The concept of universal jurisdiction is a very noble, honorable concept," said Alan Baker, a legal adviser to the Foreign Ministry. "The danger is in the fact that Arabs have decided to abuse the concept and utilize them perhaps naivete of European countries."

According to Foreign Ministry officials, Arab interests may lead to more lawsuits against Israeli officials.

As the 10-month-old Palestinian uprising continues, Arab nations are trying to delegitimize Israel and "carry out its warfare in a different field," attempting to gain favour among European nations, Baker said.

"We support universal jurisdiction," he said. "But this whole thing has been blown out of proportion." The challenges in Belgium and Denmark – along with the upcoming World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa – have made government officials and Israel supporters extremely uncomfortable.

There has been widespread concern in government circles about the conference, whose tentative agenda includes discussion of "racist Zionist practices" and equates the Holocaust with "ethnic cleansing of the Arab population in historic Palestine."

Arab delegates to the conference were the source of the anti-Israel moves. Mary Robinson, the UN high commissioner for human rights, said recently that they should drop wording from a draft document seeking to equate Zionism with racism. The United States has threatened to boycott the conference over the issue.

The Foreign Ministry is preparing for the conference with a human rights lawyer in Geneva drafting a statement that will "hopefully get rid of all the offensive language," Baker said.

While Israel is feeling the heat, several countries are coming out against the potential witch hunt, Baker said, citing Germany, Canada and the United States.

The ministry hopes these nations will have enough influence with the Arabs to block future anti-Israel moves.

In the meantime, Baker and his staff are asking officials in various Israeli embassies to obtain copies of their host countries' legislation in order to be prepared for potential lawsuits.

"Our job as advisors to the government is to be prepared," Baker said. "We don't want anyone to ever say, 'You didn't warn us.'"

Here's to you, Mrs. Robinson

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

On Nov. 12 of last year, when the Palestinian intifadah was already in full swing, Mary Robinson, the United Nations high commissioner for human rights, came on an official visit to Israel and the Palestinian territories.

Robinson was known as the former president of the Republic of Ireland. Whether because of her position in the UN or for other reasons, she had a reputation for being anti-Israel. This did not interfere with her visit because her hosts in Israel decided to afford her respect, but something extraordinary happened that day.

While she was visiting the area of Hebron and Kiryat Arba, those who were accompanying her proposed that she visit Tel Rumeida. Her bodyguards were provided by the local UN force, known as TIPH – Temporary International Presence in Hebron. As the convoy was travelling to the town, shots were fired at it. One tracer bullet hit the vehicle accompanying that of Robinson.

Immediately, the accusation was that those who had opened fire were Israelis, apparently Jewish settlers who were trying to hit the important guest. When Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat greeted the guest, he offered her the armoured car in which he usually travels, for protection against the Israelis. With her silence, the guest seemed to accept the accusations against Israel.

The remnants of the bullet were extracted from the UN vehicle and sent for ballistics tests that were performed by the ballistics department of the Danish police. Recently, the UN report on the tests was published, and the findings show that the bullet that hit the vehicle had been fired from a Kalashnikov AK-47 rifle.

This is a weapon with which Palestinians, including members of the security forces, are armed. IDF personnel and the Jewish settlers do not have such weapons.

To the credit of the TIPH, they did not confine themselves only to ballistic tests. Their personnel in the area, together with the Danish experts, carried out a reconstruction at the site of the shooting.

The report notes that the reconstruction "clearly designated the origin of the shot: a house in the H1 area, north of Bal al-Zawiya."

H1 is the area under Palestinian control in Hebron. From all this, it should have been concluded that those who fired at Robinson's convoy were Palestinians.

This ended the affair, but there has been no statement from Robinson. More precisely, there has been no apology for the blame cast on Israel. And this has not been forthcoming.

It is to be hoped that she conducts international affairs in the field of human rights with more objectivity. Courage and honesty are not what she has displayed in the case before us.

French Jews no longer afraid to speak out

By JOSHUA SCHUSTER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Analysis

For French Jews, the past 10 months of Israeli-Palestinian violence have had one positive side effect: The French Jewish community has found its voice.

Within the last month, more than 7,000 members of the community gathered to protest the visit of Syrian President Bashar Assad to Paris, and a series of meetings was later held with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Finally, French Jews launched a pro-Israel assault on the French media and publicly protested Europe's often unbalanced impact – in favour of the Arabs – on the Middle East peace process.

All of this prompted Sharon to describe France's Jewish community as the "most militant" in Europe.

Standing in dramatic contrast to their reputation a generation ago of being fractured and timid, the description "most militant" is one French Jews are proud to claim.

"We are now the best organized and most activist" of Jewish communities in Europe, said Jean Kahn, president of the Consistoire, the umbrella group of religious French Jewish organizations. "This has given the French Jewish community another dimension."

The French community's response to misinformation and boycotting threats in Europe since Israeli-Palestinian violence began last fall has marked the end of the community's timidity, a reticence going back to World War II or even earlier, when French Jews didn't dare speak out for fear of appearing disloyal to the government.

The French Jewish community has been organized for centuries, having established the Consistoire during the days of Napoleon. But it is only now beginning to show its promise.

"We are much better situated now than just a few decades ago," said Haim Musicant, director of CRIF, the umbrella group of secular French Jewish organizations.

Though CRIF deals with political matters and the Consistoire deals with religious issues, the two groups often work in tandem.

Musicant traces the community's modernization to the wave of Sephardi immigration from North Africa that began in the 1960s; the majority left their homeland due to anti-Israel animus.

Before that, the French Jewish community numbered about 300,000. Today it numbers at least 600,000, the largest Diaspora community after those in the United States and the former Soviet Union.

But Musicant noted that the demographic change needed a generation to be fully felt. The immigrants' most pressing initial concerns were economic, as many arrived in France after being stripped of nearly all their possessions – a mandatory requirement for "permission" to leave their country.

However, after generations as second-class citizens in the Muslim world, the Sephardi communities that arrived in France were eager to display their Judaism openly.

They first got the chance in 1967, when the Six Day War erupted. Some 100,000 Jews rallied in support of Israel in the heart of Paris, still the largest Jewish demonstration ever held in Europe.

It also marked the first time France's Jewish community challenged its government – though it turned out to be something of an isolated event. Then-president Charles de Gaulle had already shown French support for the Arab league against Israel, a policy that many French Jews feel exerts a strong influence on the government even today.

"It was the beginning of our conscious political development," Musicant said. "From then on, we were able to affirm [our] devotion to Israel even when it went against the policies of France."

In addition, Kahn said, the French government has also had something of a change of heart, and he now finds himself called upon by President Jacques Chirac to speak out in forums where Jews are maligned.

Chirac has asked Kahn – on behalf of France, not just the Jewish community – to attend next month's UN conference on racism in South Africa that is expected to harshly criticize Israel.

Musicant also acknowledges that the Jewish community has finally reached a privileged status in its relations with many French politicians.

A few decades ago, the community was considered of little more than a marginal political interest to French leaders. But "now I can call Chirac, set up a rendezvous, and it's no problem," Musicant said.

The most significant change in the community's relationship with the government came when Chirac went before the community in 1995 to recognize, for the first time, France's Holocaust guilt.

It was a seminal event that Jewish leaders recount to visitors as well as among themselves, as if to confirm that the apology, so long in coming, was actually made.

As French Jewish political identity solidifies, the organizational infrastructure of the community is coming under pressure to perform well. So far it seems to be holding up, despite the fact that the community's financial means and membership pale in comparison to even a medium-sized American Jewish community. The Jewish communities of many mid-sized American cities have bigger budgets and more staff than the entire French community has.

"When we compare the power, the membership and the budget of our institutions with our counterparts in America, it is crazy. We are not even close to a comparison," Musicant said.

The community has seen an explosion of construction – a Jewish museum, a central community centre and the Foundation for the Shoah were built in the past two years – but many feel the new operations are understaffed, with meagre budgets and the barest of public relations departments.

Indeed, most French Jewish institutions are just learning to court the media. Even so, the fledgling efforts with the media represent a dramatic shift for the community.

Musicant notes that as recently as the early 1980s, CRIF waited three days to denounce a violent attack on a Parisian synagogue, fearing the media attention.

"Now we would denounce it in two minutes," he said.

Not everyone agrees that the Jewish community has made enough strides toward organizing itself.

"Twenty years ago, there was more of a possibility to express ourselves," said Serge Benattar, editor-in-chief of the weekly newspaper Actualité Juive.

It's true we can mobilize much quicker, but we probably don't mobilize as we should," Benattar said. "Everyone does his own action, but we don't have any grand organization. There are so many little events that the people become tired. The community itself is in pieces."

Musicant also acknowledges that the community faces several challenges if it is to develop to its greatest potential. Most importantly, it "needs more leaders, more members and more money," he said.

It's a tall order but not an impossible one, community leaders insist. While fund-raising in the community comes primarily from a few legendary families such as the Rothschilds, the United Jewish Appeal in France succeeded a few years ago with a campaign to help poor Jewish families and unemployed members of the community.

Still, Musicant concedes that "the average Jewish family hardly gives at all to the general community."

Among the first projects on CRIF's wish list is to sponsor trips to Israel for non-Jewish journalists, in the hope of helping diminish what many see as the French media's anti-Israel bias.

Other plans include a major reunion with French-speaking Jews in Belgium, whom Musicant says he meets only once or twice a year.

Finally, he wants to set up projects linking Jewish communities in France and the United States. Jewish tourists to Paris generally visit only the historic quarters of the community, which French Jews themselves rarely frequent, since most of the community live and work outside of these quarters.

"The community is in the midst of expansion, but at the same time it needs to reflect on itself," Musicant said. "It needs a vision of what all these things – the CRIF, the Consistoire, the radio station, the museums, the community centre, etc. – should transmit to our children.

"For a while, everything turned around Israel," he said. "The communities now need to speak among themselves to find out where they are going."

Deadline nears for Swiss bank claims

BY FREDY ROM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ZURICH — Holocaust survivors or their heirs who believe they have a valid claim on a dormant Swiss bank account dating back to the Holocaust era have little time left to file claims.

In February, Swiss banks published the names on 21,000 accounts that may have belonged to Holocaust victims. At the time, they imposed a six-month deadline to claim those accounts.

The Claims Resolution Tribunal, which is overseeing the claims process, says it has processed 10,000 claims and approved payments to Holocaust survivors totalling $40 million.

The total number of names published in February was far lower than what some U.S. banking officials had expected, and, in fact, the tribunal has already received some 25,000 claims.

Jewish groups representing survivors were also surprised that more names weren't published. They argued that the process of returning survivors' assets necessitates full access to bank records.

Swiss banking officials refused to disclose such information, but said claimants who have a reasonable case could request a full database search.

Survivors have long complained about delays in the restitution process. Given the survivors' advanced age, every delay means that some survivors will not live long enough to get their money.

Advocates for survivors estimate that some 1,000 survivors around the world die each month.

Anglican newspaper lines up on Palestinian side

Last week, Congress president Keith Landy and Rabbi Reuven Bulka, chair of Congress' religious and interreligious affairs committee, wrote to Rev. Michael Peers, Primate of the Anglican church of Canada, expressing "deep disappointment and dismay" over the article. The Anglican Journal is the national newspaper of the Anglican Church of Canada, which itself has been accused of cultural genocide for its role in the residential school scandal.

"The anti-Israel tenor of the article is palpable," the letter states. They challenged the article's "outrageous and inflammatory statements" and stated the author "views the complex Israeli-Palestinian situation through large blinders and with an unwillingness to contextualize the conflict and hold the Palestinians accountable for their actions."

About a month ago, the Israeli Embassy sent a letter to Rev. Peers expressing its "frustration" at the article, but it has yet to hear back, said Amir Maimon, counsellor at the embassy.

Maimon said, "We don't have any problem being criticized, but when it comes to one-sided criticism and we're not given the opportunity to tell our side of the story, it raises many questions."

Congress has raised concerns over the article to the Canadian Christian-Jewish Consultation (CCJC), an interfaith liaison committee whose membership includes Congress, the Anglican, Presbyterian, Roman Catholic and Lutheran churches. Reaction at the CCJC was "mixed... I think there was a general understanding of why we were concerned, but I think there are people out there in the churches who see things this way," said Congress spokesperson Eric Vernon.

Israel-bashing by various churches is not a new phenomenon. Following the onset of the intifadah, senior Canadian clergy representing a number of mainline churches collaborated on a draft statement highly critical of Israel. Congress worked with its interfaith partners in the Middle East Working Group, an offshoot of the Canadian Council of Churches, "to tone down the letter, which was unbalanced, heavy on rhetoric and did not examine the root causes of the conflict," Vernon said.

The end result was a more balanced letter, but "since then we've seen some slippage. The article in the Anglican Journal is a prime example of what happens when [the writer] does not do due diligence, does not do his homework and does not see both sides," he said.

References to an Israeli-led bloodbath on the scale of Rwanda and the Holocaust "are unconscionable observations," he added.

The June article is not Carriere's – or the Anglican Journal's – first foray into Middle East politics. In a June 1998 article, Carriere wrote that "the Anglican Church in Jerusalem is heavily committed to the Palestinian cause."

"I think it's a matter of record that the Anglican Church has been supportive of the Palestinians," Carriere told The CJN. The Anglican bishop of Jerusalem is Palestinian, as are a substantial number of church leaders in the Palestinian territories, he said. Officials of Anglican Church House in Toronto were unavailable for comment.

One particularly vociferous critic of Israel is Ottawa-area priest Rev. Robert Assaly, who participated in a December 2000 "solidarity visit" to the Palestinian territories.

Rev. Assaly recently traded letters with the Israeli Embassy, attacking the "racist and brutal practices of your government" while asserting that "the majority of Israel's citizens recently elected a war criminal (Ariel Sharon) as prime minister."

He declined to participate in a dialogue on the Middle East situation, which he said would not be more useful "than dialogue with the South African Embassy in the 1980s or the German Embassy in the late 1930s."

Assaly serves as chair of the Canadian Friends of Sabeel (CFOS). Sabeel is an ecumenical organization based in Jerusalem that is a proponent of Palestinian liberation theology. Information about CFOS can be found on the Anglican Church's Web site (http://ottawa.anglican.ca/sabeel.html#cfos).

'Human shields' protect Beit Jala residents

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Thirty human rights activists from Israel, Europe and America have moved in with Palestinian families in Beit Jala to act as "human shields" against heavy IDF firing into the village across the wadi from Gilo.

The IDF says it is trying to find out exactly where the activists are staying for fear that wounding or killing any of them would create an international incident. The group, calling itself the International Solidarity Movement, says its mission is to prevent harm to innocent Palestinians in the village when the IDF retaliates with artillery and missiles for rifle fire from Palestinian snipers.

Several Palestinians and a German doctor have been killed and dozens have been wounded by IDF fire at Beit Jala in response to sniper fire at Gilo.

At least two of the 30 are Israeli women and the group says more activists are due to arrive soon. Neta Golan, who has been living in the village for the past few weeks, told Ha'aretz last week the activists are staying with Palestinian families in homes that have already been shelled.

The activists, Golan said, "are not deluded into believing that we can prevent shooting, but we hope to draw international attention. It's clear it would be more upsetting to the IDF to hit one of us than some innocent Palestinians."

Golan said she has spotted Palestinians firing from Beit Jala toward Gilo.

The IDF says it has spotted three women from the group in a house that Palestinian snipers have used as a base in the past. Golan conceded the women were in the house, but not while there was any firing from it.

Intifadah affecting North American students in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The number of American students enrolling at Israeli universities has dropped dramatically in light of the ongoing intifadah. Most of their Canadian counterparts, however, seem to be proceeding with their plans.

While Israeli universities such as Tel Aviv University (TAU) and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem have experienced a slight drop in Canadian registration, the number of Americans enrolling at Israeli universities is less than half what it was last year, according to Orly Gil, Israeli consul for academic affairs in New York.

At TAU, which together with the Hebrew University accounts for the majority of Canadians studying in Israel, Canadian registration this year has dropped slightly, from 21 students last year to 18 this year. Two students dropped out after the intifadah began last fall.

Part of the reason for the small difference relative to the United States may be due to the fact that about 60 percent of [Canadian TAU] registrants are Israeli-born, according to an estimate by Orna Benayon, Canadian Friends of TAU's director of academic affairs.

"In many ways, we're a far less assimilated community," noted Merle Goldman, director of programming and academic affairs for Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, speculating on the same question.

The Hebrew University anticipates having 35 to 40 Canadians this year, compared to 45 last year, most of whom (at least 40) stayed the year. This summer, a small contingent left Toronto July 31 to begin Hebrew language ulpan. Other students will join them when classes begin in October; a number were already in Israel.

Any drop in overseas enrolment may not be due solely to the political situation in Israel, Goldman said. Other factors include the lower value of the Canadian dollar (typically, overseas programs are priced in U.S. dollars) and the increased availability and popularity of overseas programs in other countries.

Security issues, however, are obviously a concern for others as well. At the University of California, officials in their overseas program have imposed sharp restrictions on students' movements in Israel and on their use of public transportation.

"I have conveyed one strong stricture to all students – that if they cross over into the West Bank or Gaza, they will be subject to dismissal from the program," said John Marcum, director of the university's Education Abroad program.

Such policies are not typical of American universities, but there have been a few instances, said Gil.

At York University, which has students on direct exchange programs with Israel as well as on special one-year programs, guidelines include maintaining close contact with Israeli university personnel and checking foreign affairs advisories, said Maria Cioni, director of York International.

"We prepare our students as best we can. They do sign waivers and go through intensive orientation," she added. "We hope to select students who will thrive when they're abroad and that means students who are knowledgeable about their situation abroad and will act accordingly."

Deborah Neufeld, Bar-Ilan University's director of academic affairs for overseas students, noted from her office in New York that overseas students receive regular security briefings and are expected to be in daily contact with madrichim (older student leaders living on-site in the dorms). "There are no disciplinary repercussions [if they don't follow guidelines], because they're adults and we're trying to treat them that way."

Only a small percentage of Bar-Ilan's overseas students are Canadian – "in the single digits," she said. Although numbers this year are slightly down, that may change, she indicated, noting that in past years the school has picked up new students later in the academic year.

In response to the intifadah, Benayon outlined strong recommendations in a letter to TAU students. Among the points she stressed were to avoid taking a cab alone or going out alone at night, to notify the TAU office in Israel if leaving the dorms overnight, and to be in contact with their parents [at least] every second day.

To allay parents' concerns, Benayon made herself available by phone around the clock. Most often, she is called by a parent who can't locate his or her child. Prior to the intifadah, she said, contact with parents typically took place twice a year.

Despite the restrictions, the students had "the best time of their lives," Benayon said.

"It always appears worse here than it is there," said Goldman, who was in Israel in June. Nonetheless, she added, "we expect [students] to be careful. We will do our best to ensure they have a quality and safe experience."

Alberta professor helps develop safe method to excavate oil sands

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

One day not far off in the future, the vast oil sands deposits in Alberta will give Canada the gift of virtual independence from foreign oil suppliers.

Alberta's oil sands supposedly contain more petroleum than all the known reserves in Saudi Arabia, the world's biggest producer.

The development of the oil sands was a major collaborative effort of politicians, scientists, engineers and administrators.

And one person who played no small part in developing these reserves was Norbert Morgenstern, a professor of civil and environmental engineering at the University of Alberta in Edmonton.

Born and raised in Toronto, he devised cost-effective, environmentally acceptable methods of excavating the oil sands, a mixture of bitumen, sand, water and clay.

These methods had been used in the coal industry. Starting from this base line, he made it possible to extend them to the oil patch.

The achievement has not gone unnoticed. Morgenstern, a member of the Alberta Order of Excellence and the Order of Canada, recently won the Killam Prize. The award, worth $100,000, recognizes accomplishments in the natural sciences, health sciences and engineering.

Now 66, he has been involved in the oil sands sector for almost 30 years, having been a consultant to Sun Corp. and Syncrude Canada Ltd., the two major extractors of the resource.

Although Morgenstern's dragline method is being replaced by a newer technology, the truck-and-shovel approach, he can take solace from the fact that without his technical expertise, the fabulous wealth of the oil sands may not have been brought to the surface.

The oil sands of northern Alberta are awash with about 1.7 trillion barrels of bitumen. Once bitumen is separated from the sand, oil and clay, it is upgraded into a high-quality oil called synthetic crude.

Using current technology, the raw bitumen can potentially be converted into more than one trillion barrels of synthetic crude.

By comparison, Alberta's conventional oil reserves hold approximately 4.5 billion barrels of oil.

Today, the oil sands provide Canada with about 20 percent of its needs. But within a decade, Morgenstern estimates, these fields will produce a larger proportion of Canadian oil.

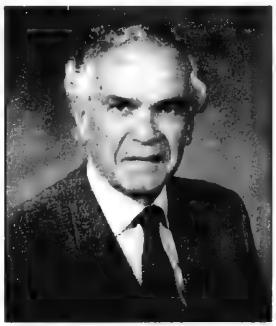
"It's significantly more expensive to extract oil from the oil sands," he allowed, "but it's still hugely profitable because the price of oil is high."

Throughout his career, which began at Imperial College in London as a research assistant, Morgenstern has been interested in soil mechanics and geotechnical engineering, both of which test the strength of the earth's crust.

As a young researcher, he studied the dynamics of landslides. He then used this knowledge to advise mine operators, the Panama Canal authority and urban developers in cities like Hong Kong about the probability of landslides.

Of late, he has combined the study of risk analysis procedures for landslide assessment with the study of slope stability.

During the 1970s, when there was pressure to tap the oil and gas resources of the Arctic, Morgenstern was a permafrost engineering advisor.



Norbert Morgenstern

In this capacity, he was called upon to evaluate the resiliency of the ground during thaws and under freezing conditions.

Oil was ultimately extracted from the Arctic. But due to environmental and local community concerns, gas has yet to flow from that region.

In addition, Morgenstern, who has lectured at the Technion in Israel, has travelled far and wide advising dam builders on how best to construct water storage and hydro-electric dams on weak ground.

He has worked on dam projects in Canada, the United States, Malaysia, Brazil, Panama, Iran, Jordan and Tunisia.

As an expert in mine waste management, Morgenstern has developed safe, economically viable and environmentally sound storage areas.

It's a monumental problem. "Whether you're mining copper or gold, you have to get rid of tailings," he said. "The mining industry has required lots of help to improve its practices."

Though Morgenstern officially retired from teaching at the University of Alberta in 1999, he still teaches the occasional course and maintains an office there as a researcher.

He is also a consultant to the oil sands and mining industries. "I'm pretty busy, but I have more control over my life now," said Morgenstern, who, with his wife Patricia, has three grown children, Sarah, Katherine and David.

Morgenstern was drawn to engineering by his father, Joel, a house builder who, with his spouse Bella, immigrated to Canada in the 1920s from Poland via Palestine.

After graduating from Harbord Collegiate Institute in 1952, Morgenstern attended the University of Toronto and then Imperial College.

The University of Alberta hired him in 1968, and he enjoyed teaching immensely. "I was blessed with having terrific graduate students," he said. "I've supervised about 50 PhD students. There are a lot of talented people in that group."

Sleep apnea disorder widespread: researcher

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Dr. Harvey Moldofsky

TORONTO — Sleep apnea, a sleeping disorder that can lead to high blood pressure, heart attacks and stroke, affects a staggering number of people, but most sufferers remain undiagnosed and untreated, says a pioneer researcher in the field of sleep disorders.

Sleep apnea occurs when a person's airway becomes blocked during sleep. The need for air forces them to wake up, a pattern that can occur hundreds of times during the night without the sufferer ever realizing it, says Dr. Harvey Moldofsky, who works out of the College Street location of the Centre for Sleep and Chronobiology, the first multidisciplinary sleep disorders clinic in Canada.

Breathing stops because the airway collapses, preventing air from getting into the lungs. This can be the result of a variety of factors, says Moldofsky.

Obesity, for example, can cause fat to accumulate around the neck. When fat gets into the tissue, it causes a narrowing of the air passage.

"As we age, the strength of the muscles holding open the airway becomes lax. This makes it harder for air to pass to the lungs."

The tongue or tonsils may also block the airway, he says.

No matter what the cause, all result in sleep disruption, which can have serious consequences, says Moldofsky.

"The most common consequence of fragmented sleep is tiredness. The risks of tiredness can include falling asleep, especially if you're driving in monotonous conditions such as on the highway," he explains.

"Even if you fall asleep for just a second you can have an accident."

Motor vehicle and industrial accidents are just two risks associated with sleep apnea.

"If you add alcohol to the mix, it makes the disorder worse. Just one ounce of alcohol will aggravate the condition. It depresses the breathing centre, making you less likely to awaken," he says.

"The oxygen concentration in the blood drops," he says, "putting a strain on the heart. Over time, the result is high blood pressure."

Heart irregularities is another possible consequence that results when the heart rate speeds up and slows down many times during the night.

Moldofsky explains that the heart rate slows down when a sufferer stops breathing during sleep and speeds up when a sufferer wakes up gasping for air.

Sufferers also develop an increased risk for heart attacks and possibly even strokes.

"[In Canada] four percent of men and two percent of women develop this condition," says Moldofsky.

Women are most likely to develop sleep apnea in their menopausal years while men develop the condition when they enter middle age. This is mainly because of weight gain, especially around the neck.

Children can even develop the disorder, "particularly those that have large tonsils and adenoids," he says.

Though serious and fairly common, sleep apnea has become a pervasive concern among medical health professionals only in the last decade after research showed that the disorder is more common than was initially thought, he says.

Sleep apnea is difficult to recognize, says Moldofsky, because the symptoms, which include tiredness and snoring, are common.

"Twenty-four percent of the population complain of being tired," he explains.

And while many people simply shrug off snoring as a loud and obnoxious disturbance, it may be a sign of difficulty breathing.

Getting a doctor's referral and having a sleep study done is often the only way to determine whether snoring or tiredness is related to sleep apnea.

During a sleep study, which is usually performed in a clinic, sensors monitor clients' heart, lungs, brain, muscle movements, air flow from the nose and mouth and the blood's oxygen level.

If a client is diagnosed with the disorder, Moldofsky says that there are three different approaches to management that can be recommended in conjunction with weight loss.

"The first treatment may be surgery. There are many different procedures to remove tissue and open the airway," he says.

However, "while surgery may reduce snoring, half [of patients] have a recurrence in sleep apnea."

The dental community has also taken an interest in how they can apply their knowledge to alleviating the disorder, says Moldofsky.

"With a mechanical device placed in the mouth, dentists can manipulate the jaw and move it forward to open the airway."

The most popular and effective treatment is CPAP (continuous positive airway pressure) therapy, says Moldofsky.

"This method increases the size of the airway by forcing air through the nose. It will cause the airway to open so air can get to the lungs."

A CPAP machine consists of a nasal mask that sits tightly over the wearer's nose. A hose connected to the mask and a machine channels air into the nose.

"The oxygen device is a godsend for those with severe sleep apnea because they wake up and they're alert. They feel energized and a lot happier because they were able to have a restful sleep."

JGH exhibit looks into the past

MONTREAL — Art therapist Mona Rutenberg has transformed the walls of the Jewish General Hospital's geriatric floor with a permanent exhibition, as a way to remind patients of happier times.

A Look Into the Past, created and designed by Rutenberg, consists of 10 display cases filled with everyday items from the 1920s to the 1950s – kitchen utensils, eyeglasses, women's purses and gloves, paper dolls, metal toy cars, grooming and shaving products.

The display cases, which were recently mounted in two hallways of the sixth-floor long-term-care unit, also contain a large-framed puzzle depicting toys from a bygone-era, an impressive display of lace from the late 1800s, and laminated 1920s fashion catalogue pictures, sheet music and ads from old magazines. Each item, which Rutenberg collected from flea markets and various individuals, is clearly labelled.

The idea, she explained, is to give the patients a connection with their past and, if they are able, something to talk about. The items can also be useful for visiting family searching for ways to start a conversation with their relative, she said.

"This is all about encouraging communication," Rutenberg said.

Before the objects were permanently encased, she let the patients handle them.

"One person remembered being in her kitchen, where refrigeration meant storing goods in a hole in the floor where it was cool and damp," she said.

"Another remembered, as a child, cutting out paper dolls from monthly magazines and playing with them for hours on end.

"Some have no long-term memory and can't speak full sentences. But when you put something in their hands that's tangible and familiar, some association may come to mind. One man held an ice cream scoop. He couldn't say what it was called, but he mimed with his hand a scooping motion," she said.

Breakdancer does battle in an underground world

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — It's one a.m. and while most young teenagers are fast asleep, 15-year-old Michael Prosserman is battling in the underground world of breakdancing

His father, supportive of his son's unique talent, is watching on the sidelines.

After hearing about breakdancing from his brother's friend about two years ago, he began learning dance moves from an Internet site until his father found him a professional instructor.

"I was very intimidated when I first started breakdancing," says Prosserman.

"When you walk into the competitions they frisk you. Most of the dancers come from rough areas of the city and they breakdance to keep out of trouble," he says. "Instead of fighting they dance."

And whereas Prosserman is close with his family and lives in a comfortable Thornhill home, living conditions are drastically different for most other breakdancers.

"Their parents mistreat them and many live in housing projects with 20 other people. It's rough when you don't have space for yourself."

Besides the slang and dance moves, if there's anything Prosserman has learned from his experience in this underground world, which he says attracts "a whole package of different people," it is that beneath the surface, "everyone is exactly the same. .

"It's not what a person looks like or what a person has, it's who they are," says Prosserman.

Despite being "quite possibly the only Jew" on the breakdancing scene, and the only one who brings his father to battles, Prosserman says he and his crew (a group of people who practice and dance together at battles, which are informal dance competitions) "are all really good friends.

"I've never been excluded [because of my privileged life]. I've even brought my crew over to my house," he says, confessing that he doesn't like to invite them over often because he doesn't want to rub in the fact that he lives a better life than the rest of them.

"Even if we compete against each other, we all know we're together," says Prosserman, whose battle name, a unique pseudonym dancers give to each other, is Picz (pronounced pieces).

Sometimes dancers battle one on one, two against two or crew against crew. Each time a crew or an individual has their turn, they have to do something better and more original than their competitors. Judges determine the winner.

"Sometimes battles are unfriendly. Anger builds up between two crews because they've been competing against each other for a long time, and things can get out of hand. A club was closed once because there was almost a fight. It was scary."

These competitions, which can last from 7 p.m to 3 a.m. and sometimes take place in grimy, dark clubs, are part of an underground world that Prosserman says has its own culture and lifestyle.

Though he says nobody knows where breakdancing originated, the distinctive dance style, which he says combines power moves, footwork, style and freezes, has spread around the world.

Popular in the 1980s, he says he believes it was "overcommercialized," which caused it to die by the end of that decade.

But the late 1990s experienced a breakdancing renaissance, with the biggest dance scenes in the United States emerging in New York, California and Texas.

He says that being part of this world makes him feel as if he's living a double life. But in the future, Prosserman plans to make the world of breakdancing more mainstream and accessible to the public.

"When I'm in my 20s I want to teach dance classes and open a studio where competitions can be held. More of the public will come to watch breakdancing if they know where to find it," he says, adding that currently, events are held at different venues each time and usually only the dancers and organizers know where to go.

"This year I hope to organize a big event, like a Canadian championships, to attract dancers to Toronto. I want to make the city one of the biggest breakdancing scenes in the world."

In the meantime, Prosserman practices for 30 minutes to an hour each day and has made it his goal to become one of the best dancers in the world within the next few years.

He battled his former teacher in a competition recently and came "really close" to beating him, and at a competition a few weeks ago Prosserman won the title of Breakdancer of the Night and was awarded a cellular phone.

But all the success he's achieved in just two years, and any success he'll have in the years to come, he attributes to his father who actively supports his son's underground life.

Penguin will expand Canadian publishing, company's president Cynthia Good says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Cynthia Good was hired as its editorial director in 1982, Penguin Canada did not have much of a Canadian publishing program.

"Few Canadian titles were published," Good said candidly.

Nineteen years on, two things have changed.

Good is now president and publisher of Penguin, which has become one of Canada's leading producers of Canadian fiction and non-fiction.

Indeed, she pointed out in an interview, fully one-third of Penguin's books are either written by Canadians or turn on Canadian themes.

And in the future, she added, Penguin, owned by the international media conglomerate Pearson, will expand its Canadian program.

Good, a specialist in 19th century British fiction, the topic of her incomplete PhD thesis, has reason to be proud of her distinguished roster of Canadian authors.

They include novelists Alice Munro, Timothy Findley and the late Mordecai Richler and Robertson Davies.

In the non-fiction category, they range from Pierre Berton and Michael Ignatieff to Peter Newman and John Ralston Saul.

Being interested in social and political issues, she has published books on the role of politics in our lives, the place of the wilderness in Canadian identity, the impact of hockey on our national consciousness, the tragedy of homelessness and the health care crisis in Canada.

"We bring these issues to readers," said Good, who was an actress and theatre company operator before plunging into publishing.

So committed is she to such themes that Penguin has sponsored two conferences in Toronto about them, and plans to host a third in Vancouver in October.

As in the past, the panellists will consist of Penguin's array of writers.

Good, born in Toronto in 1951, gravitated toward the world of ideas after finding a niche in publishing. Her parents, Philip and Charlotte, who ran a printing and office supply business, were not politically or socially active.

During her childhood, Good was a television and radio actress, making her debut at the age of about eight.

In 1969, toward the end of high school at Newtonbrook Secondary, she and friends started the Menagerie Players, and kept at it for three years.

Being eager to develop her talents as a thespian, she enrolled at the American Academy of Dramatic Arts in New York City.

There she discovered that her acting abilities left something to be desired. "I wasn't bad, but I wasn't great."

Back home, at the University of Toronto, Good decided to pursue a career in academia. She earned a BA in 1973 and an MA in 1974.

Researching a doctorate degree, she concentrated on 19th century British novelists like George Eliot, Henry James and the Brontes.

Army experience contributed to dancer's routine

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Her mother's recent death didn't deter her nor could serving in the Israeli army, and that is why Dana Ruttenberg is still deeply embedded in the world of modern dance.

Ruttenberg, 22, began dance lessons, both ballet and modern, at the age of five and attended a performing arts high school in Israel, where she was born and raised.

When she turned 18 and was called up to serve in the air force, she thought she'd never dance again.

"In the army you can't dance because you don't have time," Ruttenberg confides. "After two years of not dancing, I thought that I shouldn't continue with it because I had lived without it for so long."

Red Hill Project members frozen in a pose.

But, she says, like many young Israelis who've finished serving in the army, Ruttenberg found herself attending Columbia University in New York, a move that was emotionally difficult to make.

"When you give two years of your life to serve in the army and protect your land, you feel more of a connection to it. [Israelis] are very connected to where they live. It's a big part of us."

At the same time, Ruttenberg says, a lot of Israelis come to the United States "because in Israel, you have to declare a major right from the start. Columbia gives you two years to decide, and I loved that because I didn't know what I wanted to study."

If she had stayed in Israel, she says she might have majored in psychology and might never have returned to dance, but in New York, her old hobby wove its way back into her life.

"I took one dance class just for fun. Then every semester I added one more class and one more class. Pretty soon I was performing again. Coming back to it made me realize what was missing in my life."

Now going into her third year, Ruttenberg is majoring in dance and film and has even formed her own dance troupe, called Red Hill Project, which performed recently in Toronto at the Fringe Festival for Independent Dance Artists. Taken from her surname, which means red mountain in German, Ruttenberg dances, choreographs and acts as artistic director for the troupe.

Ruttenberg says that her experience in the army actually contributed to her dancing and added an Israeli aspect to the stream of modern dance she practices.

"The army taught me a lot. You learn how to work towards one goal in an ensemble. You learn how to lead and how to be led."

As for her dance style, which she describes as blunt, opinionated and demands that the dancer not be afraid, she says it can be attributed to being Israeli.

"I come from a place where you're taught to have an opinion, about yourself, about your country."

In dance, she says this translates into deciding how she wants to move and in determining the message she wants to emit in her work.

"Being Israeli prepares you to know that the good comes with the bad. It's a matter of composition. The good and bad have to be balanced. I don't remember a prefectly quiet time in Israel, but we continue our lives and go to the same places where there was a bombing the day before."

This attitude and the strength it involves has helped her deal with the death of her mother, who passed away in January from the eating disorder anorexia nervosa.

"I thought of going home when my mother died, but it was her dream for me to dance. She would have wanted me to stay [in New York]."

Ruttenberg dedicated the piece her troupe performed in Toronto to her mother, who, she writes in the program, "took me to my first dance class."

"I know what she wanted. She continued and never stopped and I'll do the same. [My happiness] made her so happy."

As a result of the cause of her mother's death and also because she says she had friends in high school who suffered from eating disorders, Ruttenberg wants to go back to Israel when she graduates and start her own dance school, which would include nutrition counselling and a psychological aid centre.

"When you start dancing at a young age and you spend hours in front of a mirror in dance classes, you think a lot about how you look and what your body should look like. When your body is your tool, you can get angry at it and you shouldn't," she says.

"Anyone can dance if they put their mind to it. Dancing is about how you move your body; you don't need the 'right' body to dance."

As for her own dancing, Ruttenberg says in the near future she might create pieces that comment on her Israeliness and her mother's death.

Though these projects no doubt require a lot of inner strength to pursue, Ruttenberg is determined to continue her dancing career.

"Nothing fulfils me more than dance," she says.

Good takes interest in publishing education

While pursuing a PhD, Good began working part-time for a law firm. During this period, she met a man who changed her life, the owner of Dorset, a small publishing house.

In 1978, she abandoned her PhD and started working for Dorset as an editor. Essentially, Good learned the ins and outs of the publishing trade there.

Apart from acquiring and editing manuscripts, she promoted the finished books.

After Dorset, she became marketing manager at the Doubleday Book Clubs, and then moved to Penguin, one of the world's leading English-language publishers.

As a result of her success with the Canadian publishing program, Good was appointed vice-president and editor-in-chief in 1987 and publisher in 1990.

Four years ago, she was promoted to president of the newly reorganized publishing division.

Aside from her duties at Penguin, Good has taken an abiding interest in publishing education.

She was a member of the first advisory board of the Canadian Centre for Studies in Publishing at Simon Fraser University, where she is now chair.

Since 1996, Simon Fraser has offered an MA in publishing, the first degree of its kind in Canada.

"There's something very exciting about seeing a new generation of publishers appear," said Good, a divorcee with no children and a lay cantor at Holy Blossom Temple.

She feels that these programs can only enhance the publishing industry, which has been through rough times of late.

"Publishing, as a business, has become much more complicated in recent years.

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN PART II

Last April, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival screened a 42-minute documentary on Emma Goldman, the legendary American-Jewish anarchist and feminist who spent several periods of exile in Toronto. Coleman Romalis's film Emma Goldman: The Anarchist Guest presented a refreshing and overdue account of Goldman's productive years in Toronto.

A recent book pays more attention to Goldman's three periods of residence in Toronto (1926 to 1928, 1933 to 1935, and 1939 to her death in 1940). The World's Most Dangerous Woman: A New Biography of Emma Goldman, by Theresa Moritz and Albert Moritz (Subway Books) accounts for her Toronto years in such generous detail that it provides an important chapter of our history, particularly as it relates to the labour movement.

The Moritzes contend that "Red Emma", as the Americans dubbed her, was the world's most dangerous woman because she could adapt her brand of anti-establishmentarianism and anarchy to practically any place she happened to be. She was a radical, plain and simple, on whatever soil she found herself, including Canada's.

The authors bring to light many new private sources in Europe and the United States, and so present what is virtually a fresh interpretation of Goldman's life. The Moritzes live in Toronto and are the previous authors of a biography of Stephen Leacock and The Oxford Literary Guide to Canada.

The Richler Dynasty: Normally a first novel doesn't get that much press. But when it comes from the pen of one of Canada's most famous literary families, people pay attention.

Several months ago, Emma Richler joined several of her siblings as a published author with Sister Crazy, produced by the prestigious publishing house, Alfred A. Knopf. The book has generated a ton of ink. The liner notes call it a "wickedly smart and generous work of fiction," and it is all of that, to judge by excerpts that have appeared in Saturday Night Magazine and elsewhere.

Seems that Emma Richler has inherited her late father's deep sense of cynicism, which is not necessarily a bad thing. Look how far it took Mordecai. Although her depiction of an eccentric family (including a "gruff Jewish father") has raised eyebrows for its possible resemblance to her real-life family, it's unfair to treat any novel as more than a work of fiction.

Fortunately, Emma also seems to have acquired her father's funny bone, as when the fictional Jem questions her (fictional) father's belief "that a thump will make a thing function":

"My dad is a pummeler of dashboards, a boxer of boilers, a rattler of fax machines, telephones, turnstiles and parking meters, a walloper of drinks dispensers, a slapper of remote controls. He is the man you see stabbing a lift button eight or nine times. He is also the one kicking the lawn mower, and pulling and pushing on locked doors, wildly enough to loosen the foundations of a house. It is possible this man had children in order to operate machinery for him."

More by Ravvin: Norman Ravvin, whose recent travel book is reviewed elsewhere in these pages, is the editor of Not Quite Mainstream: Canadian Jewish Short Stories, an anthology due from Red Deer Press in October.

The assortment includes works by established writers like Mordecai Richler, Matt Cohen and Adele Welsman, as well as a new generation represented by Cary Fagan, Elaine Kalman Naves, Claire Rothman, Robyn Sarah, Ken Sherman and Tom Wayman. There are even some pieces translated from the Yiddish of Yaacov Zipper and Chava Rosenfarb.

Ravvin is the author of Cafe des Westens, a novel that treats of Jewish life in his native Calgary, and a forthcoming novel, Lola by Night.

Exploration of History: Andrew Sanders, a resident of both Toronto and Haifa, is the author of a new work of historical fiction, Hanina My Son: A Novel of the First Century, which has already appeared in Israel in Hebrew translation.

Published by Gefen, Hanina My Son is set during a time of fighting between the Pharisees and Sadducees, the Shammaites and Hillelites, the zealots and Roman oppressors, that culminated in the destruction of the Temple. The book demonstrates "the greatest gift of our ancestors: their unquestioning belief and unconditional love for God."

Sanders has produced a sequel, My Husband Bar-Kokhba, for publication next year. He is also the author of Dear Maimonides, a treatise on science and religion.

Actor likes to get involved in the world

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Elyssa Livergant is an actor who believes "life can be better" which she demonstrated in her last starring role in Ines De Castro (which ended its run recently at Tarragon Extra Space).

She played a 14th century Spanish woman whose love affair with a Portugese king leads soldiers, who suspect the affair will lead to treason, to murder her.

The king is outraged and susequently exhumes her body and declares her Queen of Portugal.

"Even in death, she hangs on to her integrity. She still believes things can be better," Livergant said.

"The last thing Ines says is that they say you shouldn't allow yourself to dream, that love isn't enough, but she doesn't want to believe that. She wants people to believe there is a better way.

"In my mind, Ines is pushing for a better world in which people actually talk to each other, have regard for each other and don't follow the rule of what they think they should say."

Livergant's personal philosophy "is to get involved in the way the world is moving."

She attended Forest Hill Public School and Forest Hill Collegiate and was raised in the affluent Forest Hills area where she says "people tend to forget that just 20 blocks south there is another world going on and their lives are being compromised.

"I have friends still living in Forest Hill who don't want to know what is happening in Ontario because they might have to do something [about it]."

She is attracted to social themes in her acting, her latest project being with Pagga, a group of artists putting on Good News, a play which shows how the nature of work is changing and what it's doing to our values. It was presented at the Poor Alex and Livergant says they plan to put it on there again.

She is also co-author of the play, Back to Basics, a critical evaluation of the education scene, which, she says, is neither pro-teacher nor pro-government, but examines the situation which led to labour disputes in Ontario.

The play has been presented six times to audiences of parents, teachers and students. The last performance was for street youth in the Kensington area who are interested in developing theatre skills.

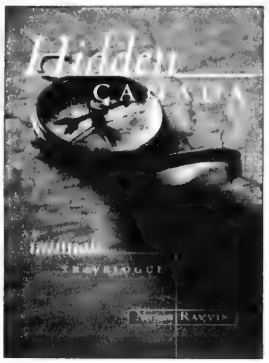
NORMAN RAVVIN GOES IN SEARCH OF CANADA



No one could accuse Norman Ravvin, the peripatetic writer who has lived in Calgary, Toronto, Montreal, Fredericton and Vancouver, of defining himself too narrowly. Still fairly young, he's already produced a novel, a collection of short stories, a book of scholarly essays on Holocaust literature, and now Hidden Canada: An Intimate Travelogue, a book about his experiences in various locations in Canada. (Red Deer, $18.95)

Don't look for a coast-to-coast Baedeker-like treatment of our great Dominion here. In seven thoughtful essays, Ravvin goes in search of seven particular destinations that, each in its own way, defines a different segment of the Canadian mosaic.

Like Jack Kerouac, who supplies the book's opening inscription, Ravvin is forever questing, be it in search of Kateri Tekakwitha in the Kahnawake reserve near Montreal, in search of the writer Malcolm Lowry near Vancouver or in search of his own family's past in his native Calgary.

He also writes about Trinity, Nfld., and Black history on both sides of the border near Windsor, Ont. As he wanders down various back roads, he seems as interested in exploring time and meaning as in exploring geography. His object is authenticity.

The essay I found most interesting is The Ghosts of Hirsch, in which Ravvin recalls the life of a series of agricultural colonies on the Saskatchewan Prairie (Hirsch, Edenbridge, Hoffer, Wapella, Lipton and Qu'Appelle) that were settled by immigrant Jews from eastern Europe around the turn of the century.

This Jewish pioneer history parallels the history of Ravvin's own family, since his grandfather, Yehuda Joseph Eisenstein, came to Hirsch in the early 1930s to be rabbi and shoichet to its 40 Jewish families.

Ravvin's meeting with the last Jewish farmer from these colonies is a simple, poignant tale that seems to embody a spirit common to all of his quests. He seems to be trying to capture something evanescent, as fleeting as light, before it disappears altogether.

I like the way The Ghosts of Hirsch ends – with Ravvin driving away, a tiny isolated speck on a vast landscape "overwhelmed by a big, dark, late-afternoon sky – miles high and wide, heavy with a rain that refuses to fall."

In Walking the Bible: A Journey by Land Through the Five Books of Moses (William Morrow, publisher), American writer Bruce Feiler documents another type of quest as he travels, not through the land of his birth, but through the ancient terrain of his Jewish heritage.

Feiler treks through Turkey, Israel and the territories, Egypt, the Sinai and Jordan in the company of a wonderful guide, Avner Goren, an Israeli archeologist whose knowledge and occasional dazzling insights greatly enliven the prose. He journeys to many biblical sites, including Mount Ararat in Turkey where Noah's ark supposedly came to rest, and Mount Nebo in Jordan where Moses looked across at the Promised Land.

Feiler writes well and with great authority about his travel experiences, which include camping out with Bedouins in the Negev, visiting Petra and crossing the border from Jordan to Israel. His description of the view from Mount Nebo in the middle of the night seems especially memorable:

"The moon was brighter than it had been all night, and the stars more vivid. All trace of haze was gone and the entire landscape was brilliantly illuminated. I could see palm fronds in Jericho, and streetlights in Jerusalem. The moon glanced off the smooth surface of the Dead Sea as if it were a silver serving tray."

Feiler was transformed by his quest, which he started with the intention of writing a secular travelogue based on culture and history. By the end of his journey, on his last dangerous night camped on Mount Nebo, he acknowledges that he has had a sort of spiritual awakening. Even if he at times seems too large a figure in the landscape he is describing, and even if he seems to provide too many answers and not enough mystery, he relates his journey well.

Varian Fry's efforts to save lives during Holocaust now come to life on video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

If you missed seeing Varian"s War at the Bayview Village in Toronto recently, don't worry about it. The film has been released on video.

Although it is always better to see a film on the big screen, video is a great substitute for those of us who don't have the time to catch a film during its theatrical run, especially if it is a short and limited release.

Varian Fry was a fascinating individual whose efforts to save lives during the Holocaust have largely been unknown. This has now changed.

With the broadcast of Varian's War by the Showtime cable network in the United States, the limited theatrical release of the film and its arrival on video, many more people will know about the deeds of Varian Fry.

Fry was a Harvard educated journalist and editor with many family connections to the wealthy elite in New York and Washington. In 1938 he was visiting Germany when he was sickened to witness the atrocities, perpetrated against the Jews during Kristallnacht. He returned to the United States and prepared to rescue some of the most important intellectuals trapped in Europe.

Fry's ideas met with a great deal of opposition and resistance in American political circles and his plans appeared to be stillborn until he found a very important ally – First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt.

In the film, Fry travelled to Marseilles in southern France and began setting up a small organization to find and then smuggle out the people he was seeking. This small group included Miriam Davenport (Julia Ormond) who served as Fry's assistant; Albert Hirschman (Matt Craven) who sought out the people Fry wanted and made the needed connections with Marseilles' underworld; and a master forger by the name of Freier (Alan Arkin) who supplies Fry with the documents necessary to cross into the relative safety of Spain.

Fry then goes into action, although this film only describes the first group of European intellectuals Fry successfully shepherds out of Vichy France – including painter Marc Chagall, writer Hannah Arendt, novelist Leon Feuchtwanger, Heinrich Mann, Franz Werfel, and Alma Mahler Gropius Werfel, who also managed to carry out original Mahler scores.

William Hurt plays the central role of Fry and is generally successful in bringing his character to life.

All in all, the real Fry helped over 2,000 intellectuals, artists, writers and scholars escape the Nazis, including such leading figures as Max Ernst, Jacques Lipchitz, Andre Masson, Andre Breton, Wanda Landowska and Otto Meyerhof.

Fry risked his own life many times on behalf of the people he rescued, and in April, 1967 Fry was awarded the Croix du Chevalier of the French Legion of Honor. Frey suffered a fatal heart attack shortly thereafter, and it is only relatively recently that the world has fully understood his contributions to mankind.

Varian's War is certainly worth renting or owning.

Junior hoops teams bring back Maccabiah medals

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — The political situation in Israel did nothing to dampen the spirits or hamper the performance of the boys and girls junior basketball teams as the girls trumped the competition to win gold while the boys lost a close final game to take home the silver at the recently concluded Maccabiah Games.

"My team was fully committed to going to the games and showing their support for Israel," said Ted Badner, coach of the boys team.

"We chose the team in September 2000 and we didn't lose any of the players because of the violence."

"We were all psyched up to go [to Israel]," said team member David Chichelnik, 16.

Badner said his team was "fortunate to upset the Israelis in the semi-finals," winning that game 63-52.

"We knew deep down we could win. The Israeli team was competitive, but we came out to play and we beat them," said Chichelnik.

The victory ushered the team into the finals where, after a gruelling game, they were beaten by the Americans 93-63, a score Badner said was not indicative of how close the game really was.

"It was a 10-12-point game until the last eight minutes. Then the game just slipped away from us."

Chichelnik agreed, saying, "the final game against the U.S. was challenging because they've got great talent, but we worked like dogs in our practices in Toronto and it paid off in Israel. We lost the lead and momentum in the last few minutes but we had kept up with the U.S. the entire time until then. We played our hearts out and did our best."

Badner said the team was disappointed to lose in the finals, but he was pleased with their overall performance, saying the team exceeded expectations.

Meanwhile, the Canadian girls dominated the competition, doubling their opponents' score in almost every game to go undefeated.

In the gold medal game, they tipped off against Israel and won 42-22. "We were all nervous for the final game against Israel," said team captain Amy Wilchesky. "We were afraid Israel had held back the first time we played them and we didn't know what to expect."

While Wilchesky said the team was up by only eight points at the end of the half, "we came together and blew them away. It was a great feeling."

"The girls executed tremendously," said team coach Neil Rothenberg.

"Their statistics were quite incredible. They held teams to less than 20 percent shooting – the defence was incredible.

"The girls were the most dominant team of any of the basketball teams statistically. Not even the U.S. boys were as dominant."

While Rothenberg admits a number of girls were feeling some uncertainty about going to Israel, the girls team didn't lose a single member. "That's a pretty significant achievement," he said.

Despite a bomb explosion a mere eight kilometres from where the team was staying, Rothenberg said the girls felt safe – in fact, Wilchesky confirmed she wasn't even aware of the bombing until she returned home – and that their spirits were high.

"The girls had such incredible spirit – it was noticed by everyone," said Rothenberg. "They were constantly singing, cheering and chanting. They were just a fantastic group to coach. They are all very serious basketball players and athletes."

Five of the 11 members of the girls team and six participants of the boys team will be going to Philadelphia to compete in the JCC/Maccabi youth games. The Toronto delegation leaves for Philadelphia Aug. 18.

Boxing impresario raises funds for athletes

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Irving Ungerman, known as "Kid Ungy" in his fighting days, is living proof that age is only a state of mind.

Still muscular at 78, Ungerman is best known for managing the likes of George Chuvalo and Clyde Gray in Canadian boxing championships, and in the case of Gray, a British title as well.

Ungerman, who was the first inductee into the Canadian Boxing Hall of Fame, was also elected to the International Sports Hall of Fame in Israel in 1993. He is a key member of the Maccabi Canada infrastructure and he raised $33,000 in a 24-hour span for the Canadian athletes travelling to Israel for the recently concluded 16th Maccabiah Games.

A medical condition prevented him from travelling to Israel for what would have been his eighth Games.

A colourful character who is quick with a boxing anecdote, Ungerman has contacts throughout the sporting world. His office is decorated with vintage photos of him meeting celebrities, politicians and actors.

When asked to compare boxers of today with those of the past, he left no doubts as to which way he stands: "With today's fighters, there is no one like Ali, Sugar Ray Leonard or George Chuvalo. No one comes close to them. The fighters of the past were far better in talent and conditioning – and [were] more honourable with the different promoters," he said.

As far as Ungerman is concerned, his one-time pupil, Chuvalo, was the best-conditioned fighter to come out of Canada in the past 40 years.

Chuvalo, who was described by his former manager as being "a bruiser," held the Canadian heavyweight boxing title for more than two decades. Twice he went the distance with Muhammad Ali, never allowing the legendary champion to knock him out.

As fate would have it, the family poultry business is where he and Chuvalo first met and began their lifelong friendship and business association.

"Chuvalo's mother was employed in my father's poultry plant. My dad would babysit him when he was in a carriage," he said.

As the years went on, the two of them would train and become teacher and pupil as they advanced through the ranks of professional boxing.

Ungerman described Chuvalo as having an instant love for boxing, and he had the support of his mother.

"His mother trusted me. That was the start of the Chuvalo team."

Later in his career, Ungerman represented Gray, a hungry fighter who went on to win Canadian and British boxing titles.

Ungerman, who used to receive visits from Joe Louis and Rocky Marciano at his house and cottage, first got involved in boxing in 1939 as a 15 year-old who won the Amateur Championships held at the Boys Club.

While serving in the Royal Canadian Air Force, Ungerman fought in approximately 25 bouts before being discharged due to a gunshot wound.

With his fighting career over, he turned to promoting. The fight business today is a far cry from what it was in his day, he said.

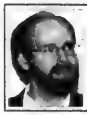
"There aren't any[more] promoters to promote fights in Canada because of the sagging value of the Canadian dollar. As a result, Canada is obviously suffering," said Ungerman, who was also responsible for introducing closed-circuit television coverage of top matches.

Charitable work is Ungerman's other passion, and he has been honoured over the past few years with prestigious awards by such organizations as Mount Sinai Hospital, Shaare Zedek Hospital, Maccabi Canada, Beth Sholom Synagogue, Variety Village, the Santa Claus Parade and B'nai Brith, to name a few.

Correction

In our coverage last week of Canada's Maccabiah Games team, "Canadians back from Maccabiah with 28 medals, countless memories," we reported that tae kwon do coach/competitor Corey Mincovitch met a long lost sister in Israel who had been put up for adoption before he was born. The CJN has learned the adopted sister story is untrue. We regret any inconvenience caused by the story.

The Greatest Thing in the World



Stories that touch the heart

By ELI RUBENSTEIN & ALEC GELCER

My family – 10 members in all – arrived in America about 60 years ago, penniless Hungarian refugees from the small village of Satmarcseke, in eastern Hungary. Like many of their contemporaries, through hard work, they became well established members of the Jewish community.

But their success story has an extra twist – the greatest thing in the world.

With the outbreak of World War II and the threat of Nazi atrocities approaching, my grandmother arranged for her husband and older children to travel to America on a cargo ship leaving Greece.

(A judge Greenblatt, a distant relative living in upstate New York, had agreed to sponsor the refugees.)

But my grandfather was serving in the Hungarian army. My grandmother tracked down his unit and pleaded with his commanding officer for his freedom. "Why do you want to go, isn't he a Hungarian citizen?" demanded the officer.

"Because my children are beaten up in the streets and called names every day. There is no future here for them in Hungary," my grandmother said.

The officer shook his head sadly but said: "By the time you return home, your husband will already be there." He was true to his word.

As my grandfather and the three oldest children went to America, time was running out on my grandmother and her five small children. Then space on a passenger ship from Spain to America was obtained for them by a sympathetic travel agent in Budapest. But to reach Spain, the family would have to travel through Switzerland, which demanded an exorbitant bond to ensure the refugees did not stay. The family had nowhere near the required amount of money.

The travel agent was moved by my grandmother's plight. "I will help you," she promised. She called a wealthy Jewish aristocrat in Budapest who owed her a favour, and pleaded with him to save the family. The man agreed and the travel agent gave my grandmother the train tickets.

My grandmother looked at the tickets. "But this train leaves on Shabbat. I can't travel on this holy Jewish day," she insisted.

The travel agent's face turned dark. "I am risking my life by telling you this. They are rounding up Jews everywhere. If you don't leave now – on this train – you may never leave!"

My grandmother understood. Soon she and her five children were headed west and reached the Spanish port, where they boarded a boat for America, via Havana.

In Havana, a Jewish man asked two of the children, my mother and her 14-year-old sister to look after his belongings for a moment. The man, who was disembarking in Havana, later picked up his belongings and walked down the gangway.

Suddenly, the girls realized he had left a small package behind. They began to yell and wave their hands in his direction. Finally, they caught his attention and he returned. The man, a diamond dealer from Belgium, had forgotten a package full of diamonds, his life's fortune.

The grateful man gave my mother's family a telephone number in New York. "Please call this number when you reach New York. I have friends there in the diamond trade. If any of you need a job, they will gladly help you out. It's the least I can do in return for what these little girls did for me."

And so it was. The older family members who had already arrived were struggling at jobs earning minimum wage. But within a few years, with the help of the Belgian refugee's contact, my grandfather learned all about the diamond industry.

Today, their name is among the most respected in the trade, and the family's many descendants are leading full lives – not just because of one mitzvah, but because of many: The mitzvah of a dedicated mother. The mitzvah of an army officer. The mitzvah of a compassionate travel agent. The mitzvah of two little girls. And the mitzvah of a grateful diamond merchant.

Since this is our last regular story, we thought it would be fitting to close with this quote from Klonimus Kalman of Piazetsna: "Children, dear children, the greatest thing in the world is to do a tovah, a good deed for another human being."

SMOOTHIES FOR LESS

Smoothies are blended drinks that are especially great in the summer when fresh fruits abound.

1. Tropical Frost - 1 frozen banana, 1/2 cup orange juice, 1/2 cup pineapple
2. Peach Blossom - 1/2 cup peaches, 1 cup apple juice, 1 frozen banana
3. Blueberry Lust - 1 cup blueberries, 1 banana, 1/2 cup pineapple juice
4. Strawberry Rush - 1 cup strawberries, 1 banana, 1/2 cup apple juice

In a processor or blender, first put in the juice, then the fruit and 3/4 cup of ice. Start machine on low and move up to puree for 2-3 minutes to complete the smoothie.

About Life

Dear Ella,

A couple of months ago I met a nice guy on one of the Jewish Internet sites. We had much in common and we have been on about 10 dates now (which is a ton for me).

Justin had a picture on the site along with an extensive bio. He sounded like a perfect match for me and I was right: we get along great and there is definitely chemistry between us.

The problem is, now that we have been dating for a while, he admits he has put lies on that site. He said he was 32 – he's 37. He said he was a medical professional – he sells medical supplies. He said he was never married – he was married once for a brief time.

I was stunned when he told me these things. Had he been honest from the beginning they may not have made a bit of difference. Now I'm not so sure. What do you think?

Shell Shocked

Dear Shell Shocked

You are torn between your head and your heart.

Justin obviously has issues. He is insecure with his own life and therefore feels he has to make himself seem younger, richer and more available.

There are a few questions you have to ask yourself: Is Justin going to lie every time something doesn't fit his perfect scenerio? Are you going to be able to trust him after he lied about such basic things?

People on the Internet bend the truth, as it is much easier to do so when you are not dealing with someone face to face. There are no immediate feelings to hurt and to some people it may seem harmless. What bothers me more than anything is that you have gone out on 10 dates and it has taken him this long to confess to some pretty major facts about himself, even after the two of you have gotten close. He has now been dealing with a real person with real feelings and that didn't seem to matter enough.

Be very careful of your decision: the longer you let this go, the more difficult it will become. This may be just the tip of the iceberg.

HOW CAN I MANAGE MY ASTHMA?

More than two million Canadians live with the potential havoc of asthma. In Canada, the disease is a leading cause of admissions to hospital. Many of these admissions can be avoided by people managing their condition.

Are there signals that an asthma attack is pending?
Yes, if your asthma is not well controlled, you are at risk of developing an asthma attack. It is likely that your asthma is poorly controlled if you have any of the following:

- you have cough, wheeze or shortness of breath during the day
- you wake up at night because of your asthma
- you are missing school or work due to your asthma
- you use your rescue medication (blue inhaler) more than usual

I don't relish the thought of visiting the Emergency Room every time I feel an asthma attack might be coming on. What else can I do?
Early recognition and treatment is important. Removing yourself from potential triggers of your asthma may help. You should discuss the options for early treatment with your doctor or asthma educator, and have a written action plan developed specifically for you. This action plan may include changes such as increasing your dose of inhaled steroid.

You should not delay seeking medical advice if:

- you have recently been hospitalized for asthma
- you have recently had your medication increased without improvement
- you are not getting relief from your rescue medication
- you have trouble walking or talking

How much should a patient self-manage asthma before professional help should be sought?
Your doctor may suggest you track your asthma using a diary card or a peak flow meter. Whenever there is no improvement after implementing the action plan, or if you are uncomfortable with your medication, dose or frequency, your should see a doctor.

Where can I get information on self-managing my asthma?
Your doctor can give you self-management education and guidelines. Also, Certified Asthma educators are trained in this process and you can ask your doctor to refer you. Further information on asthma education can be obtained from:

- the Ontario Lung Association (www.on.lung.ca) and Asthma Action Helpline at 1-800-668-7682)
- Asthma Society of Canada (www.asthmasociety.com)

Closure of Orient House was planned in June

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Israel security cabinet approved the closure of Orient House after the Dolphinarium bombing on June 1, but did not implement the decision because Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat declared a ceasefire, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told the cabinet Sunday.

Last week, however, several Palestinian offices in east Jerusalem, including Orient House, were closed down.

Sharon said the PA had carried out a great deal of official diplomatic and policing activity from east Jerusalem offices such as Orient House, in clear violation of its signed agreements with Israel in which the PA said it would limit official activities to areas under its formal control.

Furthermore, Sharon said, many of the PA's policing activities were unlawful – PA security personnel kidnapped and imprisoned people, tortured them, confiscated property and sometimes even committed murder.

Israel also closed offices in Abu Dis, considered to be in east Jerusalem, offices that served as the base for PA security forces operating in Jerusalem, Sharon said. It was also illegal for these forces to operate in Abu Dis itself, since the town is defined as Area B, meaning it is under Palestinian civilian control but Israeli security control.

In many of the buildings Israel shut down, weapons, explosives material and prepared bombs were found, he said.

Sharon said the PA's activities in the capital had severely undermined Israeli sovereignty in the city, and this would not be allowed to happen again. "This period has ended. What was, will not be again. We will not permit terrorism and incitement to return to Jerusalem, and we will not permit the Palestinian Authority to undermine our sovereignty in Jerusalem without lifting a hand. In every place and in every instance where we need to take steps to prevent this, we will not hesitate to do so, in accordance with the circumstances."

Activities 'clear violation of signed agreements'

Monday, the Israel police were to open another police station in east Jerusalem.

Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein told the cabinet the closure of Orient House was legal, since there was solid evidence it was serving as an office of the PA in breach of the agreements. However, he declined to express an opinion on the legality of Israel's keeping permanent control of the site.

The News in Brief

Canada

Funding up

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal has increased the funds available to local beneficiary agencies by seven percent. The Federation/CJA board has approved a total of $1.6 million in allocations for 11 community organizations, up from $1.5 million for eight organizations last year.

Israel

On strike

JERUSALEM — Israeli Arabs went on strike last week to protest what they called Israel's failure to improve their living conditions. Israeli Arab lawmakers said strikers are protesting the government's failure to implement a US $9.5-billion, four-year plan to develop the Arab sector. A spokesperson for the Finance Ministry said the government is committed to the plan, but that it is being delayed until at least next year while officials arrange funding. The Abraham Fund, a group working to promote co-operation between Israelis and Arabs, recently wrote Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, urging him to release funds for the Israeli Arab community.

Organ donation

JERUSALEM — Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America, organized a demonstration last week in Jerusalem to urge Israelis to donate organs for transplant. According to the Israel Association for Transplants, Israel has among the lowest rates of organ donation in the Western world.

TEL AVIV CONTRASTS: Israeli policemen arrest a Palestinian who opened fire on a group of soldiers in a drive-by shooting near the Defence Ministry in Tel Aviv. A day earlier, more than 5,000 Peace Now activists marched in the city calling for peace with the Palestinians and an end to bloodshed.

World

Rabbi objects

LONDON — Britain's chief rabbi called the planned experiments to clone humans "a new low in playing roulette with human life." In an article in the London Times, Rabbi Jonathan Sacks said human cloning is dangerous and irresponsible because of the threat that it poses "to the integrity of children so born."

Joint projects

NEW YORK — Jewish and Latino community leaders called on their respective communities to co-operate in joint projects to boost intercommunal ties. The call was made at a conference last week in New York that was sponsored by the local Jewish Community Relations Council and the Israeli Consulate.

Energy meditation

NEW YORK — More than 500 rabbis have written the members of the U.S. House of Representatives to call for moral reflection on the country's energy policy. The letter, sponsored by the Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life, follows President Bush's decision to withdraw the United States from the Kyoto Protocol, the only international framework to address climate change.

Durban deadline

NEW YORK — The UN's top human rights official urged negotiators from more than 100 countries to reach accord on a declaration that will be on the table in Durban at an upcoming World Conference Against Racism. "I make a strong appeal today to everyone to continue negotiations so the conference... can be a success," Mary Robinson said last week.

Group Anti-Semitic?

MELBOURNE — An Australian Jewish group charged that a new political party claiming to be a labour movement is a front for a national anti-Semitic organization. The B'nai Brith Anti-Defamation Commission said the Curtin Labour Alliance is a front for the Citizens Electoral Council, which supports Lyndon LaRouche, who has run for the Democratic presidential nomination in every U.S. election since 1976. In 1996, the chair of the Democratic party's national committee, Donald Fowler, called LaRouche "explicitly racist."

Sailor Wins Suit Versus Canadian military

OTTAWA — The Federal Court of Appeal has ruled the Canadian military was wrong in preventing a Jewish sailor from serving in the Middle East during the 1991 Gulf War. The decision overturns a lower court ruling that said the navy was within its rights to bar Andrew Liebmann from duty during the war against Iraq.

Liebmann, a reserve lieutenant in the navy at the time, had been slated to serve as executive assistant to the commander of the Canadian Forces Task Force in the Persian Gulf. But the military barred him, saying it had the discretion to select soldiers best able to keep the mission safe.

Liebmann argued he was being discriminated against because of his religion, and the Appeal Court agreed. It found the military presented no evidence to validate its concerns.

David Matas, senior legal counsel for B'nai Brith Canada, said the judgment could change the military mindset, which applied its rules on peace-keeping to the Gulf War. "The decision sends the message that it is improper to exclude someone if they are Jewish or Muslim," he said.

Canadian Jewish Congress applauded the decision. "There is no room in the Canadian forces for discrimination. It has to be a microcosm of Canadian society and travel abroad with all the constitutional requirements imposed on every institution... Canadian forces cannot pander to the prejudices of foreign countries," said Ed Morgan, chair of Congress' Ontario region and formerly its national legal counsel.

Jewish education growth explored in report

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Is there a worldwide trend toward faith-based schools?

Special Feature

"I don't think there's any doubt about it," said Seymor Epstein, executive director the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education. In many countries around the world, educators are witnessing an interest in faith-based schooling.

Over the past 10 years, France has seen a 45 percent increase in enrolment in Jewish schools.

Just recently, Epstein said, "the Ministry of Education in Yugoslavia issued a decree that every faith can have instruction in the public school system once a week, and the development of the curriculum is going to be paid for by the government."

There are several factors driving this phenomenon, Epstein said. There is a growing awareness that children have a developmental need for spirituality in the same way that they have a need for everything else, such as morality, motor movement and mathematical capabilities.

Another reason may be "a growing sense in the post-modern world that the scientific method alone is no longer the panacea people thought it would be.

"People are searching for a spiritual meaning in life as a complement, not a replacement, to science."

And governments are catching up with this quest for ethnic identity and spiritual meaning, Epstein said.

Just as the right-wing Progressive Conservative party in Ontario has adopted tax credits for parents of children in independent schools, a recent report published in England stated that there is a push by the centre-left New Labour government to encourage faith-based schools, which is a radical departure from past Labour policies.

The report, titled The future of Jewish schooling in the United Kingdom, indicates that while the Jewish community in England has experienced a declining, assimilating population, the number of students attending Jewish day schools has grown by 500 percent – nearly half of all Jewish pupils attend Jewish schools.

The report, published by the Institute for Jewish Policy Research (JPR), also indicates that pupils in state-sector Jewish day schools are achieving academic results that are up to 50 percent higher than the national average.

Students at Toronto Heschel School.

On the other hand, the report shows that students perform very poorly in the Judaic portion of their education, with few students going on to Jewish studies in university.

Knowledge, our obligation

From the editor's desk

Ironically, and sadly, there appeared to be a greater outcry from certain government and media circles against the closure of Orient House last week than there was against the murder of the 15 people in Jerusalem that brought about the closure of the House.

Orient House, of course, as encouraged by the PA and as lionized by many media, has become the symbol of Palestinian nationalistic aspiration generally and in east Jerusalem specifically. It was also, one must add, the administrative hub of the PA for directing its forces in the field, in plain violation of the unambiguous, written promise made by Yasser Arafat a number of times that it would not be so.

The closure of Orient House was seen by the PA, correctly, as an Israeli incursion against Palestinian freedom of political movement in east Jerusalem.

Not surprisingly, the PA vociferously protested the seizure of the building in front of the network cameras. Not surprisingly, they promised to escalate the violence until Israel released the building. Not surprisingly, too, they spread more lies about Israel: the calumny that the seizure of Orient House was a precursor to the seizure of Al Aksa itself. And again, not surprisingly, they succeeded in mobilizing world opinion against this latest affront by Israel to Palestinian dignity.

What was surprising, though, was the almost total lack of any connection in the media reports between the closure of Orient House and the relentless, murderous violence directed against Israel, symbolically, if not actually, out of Orient House.

What was also surprising was the almost total lack of any recognition in those reports of the reasonability of the Israeli response to the lunchtime killing of the 15 people.

One BBC newscast I happened to see last Thursday typified the coverage of the sequence of events.

Oded Eran, the chief peace negotiator under the Barak government, was being interviewed. He offered the opinion that the violence by the Palestinians was an unequivocal violation of the treaties signed by Arafat. In response, casting off her flimsy veil of objectivity, the BBC newscaster/interviewer, angrily shouted at Eran that the settlements were themselves a violation of the treaties.

Eran immediately corrected her. The settlements did not form part of any current treaty commitments to the Palestinians, he said. The treaties stipulated that the fate of the settlements were to be negotiated with the Palestinians; that is, once the Palestinians decided to return to negotiating.

The accuser/newscaster/interviewer however, seemed unimpressed with the facts or the truth; her pique and irritation were not abated.

That example is not an isolated instance of the way the BBC presents Israel's case. It is also not so atypical of the way in which much of North American media presents Israel's case. (See the Perspectives page in this week's CJN. The two-part essay by David Margolis that concludes in this issue eloquently explores the subject.)

In its coverage of the Sbarro bombing, last Thursday, CNN decided to offer to the viewing public Palestinian spokesperson Hanan Ashrawi's response first. Despite the obvious nuisance of the Israeli volunteers collecting bits and pieces of exploded human flesh from the ruins of the restaurant, she was still heroically able to see past the deliberate wreckage of Jewish life and property. Once again she explained to the viewer with the nuanced justifications and sophisticated propaganda for which she has become so famous, how Palestinians have been forced to murder.

The suicide bombing was not itself the real evil, she opined. It was merely a symptom of the root cause, namely, the continued "occupation" of Palestinian lands. Such vile acts were to be expected, she implied, because of the Palestinians' mounting frustration.

The CNN announcer/interviewer, of course, offered no resistance or objection to the familiar inversions of the truth that now pass as accepted dogma when it comes to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

Unfortunately, it is not only a large number of the media that is uninformed about the essential historical truths and facts of the conflict. Alas, a great many of us within the Jewish community as well are similarly unaware.

This must change if we are to be able to help Israel, and indeed ourselves, in these troubled times. We must take upon ourselves as a personal and communal obligation to become as knowledgeable as possible about the facts of the conflict and the justice of Israel's cause.

To help bolster our individual and communal "literacy" on the subject, the Canada Israel Committee is now offering a series of specifically dedicated workshops across the country. The program is called LIAT, for Local Israel Action Team Workshops.

The title, a marvellous turn of phrase in Hebrew – meaning "for you and me" – encompasses very poignantly the essence of peoplehood that explains why it is so very vital for us to raise our level of knowledge and awareness .

For information about the workshops, consult the CIC Web site at www.cicweb.ca or call their office in Ottawa 613.234.8271.

Campaign 2002 to shift focus

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The financial effects of the ongoing intifadah have resulted in a new focus for this year's UJA Federation of Greater Toronto campaign, to be launched Aug. 22.

Gift increases to the campaign will be directed through the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), the federation's overseas partner, to those in Israel who will be hardest hit by government spending reductions, it was announced in a recent federation news release.

A total of $675 million (US) is to be transferred from the budgets of other government ministries to the IDF ($500 million) and for internal security costs ($175 million), confirmed Jeff Kaye, a senior staffer at the Jewish Agency, which works in close co-operation with the Israeli government. Affected population groups are expected to include the poor, the elderly, single parent families and new immigrants.

"Now is the time for millions of Jews throughout the world to actively share the financial burden with Israel and their Israeli brethren," Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told executives of North American Jewish federations earlier this summer at the Jewish Agency's annual assembly in Jerusalem.

There has been "quite a lot" of responses from federations, said Kaye.

In Toronto, a new "challenge fund" has been established by individual families, which will match every donation increase over last year, doubling the amount allocated to meet the new needs. The fund had $2 million and was still growing as of last week, according to federation spokesperson Howard English. Typically, about half the campaign money raised is used for local needs, and half is allocated to Israel and overseas.

"It's not that we're going to be replacing the [Israeli government] funds, but we'll do what we can to reduce the impact," said Allan Reitzes, UJA Federation's executive director, who attended the meeting in Israel.

"I think the situation is very urgent," said Kaye, adding that the increased dollar support has tremendous financial value and also symbolic value in terms of increasing morale among Israelis.

Canadian, American young leaders meet

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — No one seems to know why it never happened before, but now that there are formally invited Canadian members of a prestigious American-based young leadership organization, reports are that it was a move welcomed by both sides.

An invitation to join the Young Leadership Cabinet is "a great honour, like an aliyah at synagogue," said Lance Davis, director of leadership development for UIA Federations Canada. The cabinet is the governing body of the Young Leadership department of United Jewish Communities, the umbrella for North American Jewish federations.

Members are the "top young leaders from each of the federated communities," said Richard Diamond, 41, Toronto-based chair of the Canadian National Young Leadership Executive, a body formed two years ago to co-ordinate a national agenda for young leadership groups (ages 25 to 45) across the country. Activities include leadership conferences, and trips such as an upcoming solidarity mission to Israel in October aimed in part at raising leaders' awareness of where campaign money goes.

Cabinet members must be 40 or younger when they join, have three years of significant leadership in the federation system, such as running young leadership campaigns or their local Young Adult Division (YAD), and give a minimum of $3,600 to their annual UJA campaign, said Diamond.

The invitations for the eight Canadians came about as a result of discussions Diamond and others had with cabinet chair Paul Rosen, a former Torontonian now living in Fort Lauderdale.

The first official cabinet event for the Canadians was a five-day retreat for over 300 people in Palm Beach, Fla. at the beginning of this month.

"It was definitely worthwhile," said Diamond, who moved here three years ago from Montreal. In addition to benefiting from high-level sessions on challenges facing Israel and North American Jewry, he realized that "there are hundreds of other young leaders across North America who care as much about what they as I do. It makes me feel the sense of brotherhood is stronger... You become a better leader."

Although he said Canadian needs may be different from American ones, Diamond feels there are more similarities than differences.

"I think that cabinet represents a very unique opportunity for young leaders to come together and learn together and learn from each other," said Montrealer Barry Pascal, 40, who along with Torontonian Anthony Sigel is a Canadian cabinet co-chair.

One difference Pascal noted, compared to a few of his American counterparts, involved the relationship between young leaders and their more senior counterparts. "It's very plain to me in Canada, how utilized we are as young leaders [at least] in Montreal and Toronto."

The retreat was, among other things, a networking opportunity, said Pascal. "There are people I didn't know [three] weeks ago who I feel I could call on for give and take, to share ideas."

Vatican's response to commission met with dismay by panel member

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Vatican's denunciation of an international historians' commission studying the Roman Catholic Church and the Holocaust has been met with dismay by a Canadian member of the panel.

"To focus on personalities distracts attention from the real issue," said Michael Marrus, a specialist in Holocaust studies at the University of Toronto.

Speaking from Cape Town, South Africa, where he was on a lecture tour, he said, "In the end, the matter must be decided on the basis of unfettered research."

Last week, a Vatican spokesman, Rev. Peter Gumpel, a German Jesuit priest in charge of gathering documents to support the possible beatification of Pope Pius XII, denounced the historians for unleashing what he called a "slanderous campaign" against the church.

Rev. Gumpel was responding to a decision by the historians to suspend its investigation of Vatican archival material after they were refused free access to unpublished documents relating to the period before and during the Holocaust.

Rev. Gumpel declared: "In recent days, a violent attack has again been unleashed against the Catholic Church. The occasion for this slanderous campaign has been furnished by the decision of the Jewish-Catholic study group to suspend its activity."

Consisting of three Jewish and three Catholic scholars, the panel was jointly established in 1999 by two bodies: the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews and the International Jewish Committee on Interreligious Consultations, chaired by U.S.-based Seymour Reich.

Under an agreement, the historians agreed to review 11 volumes of published Vatican records from World War II and to pose questions about that documentation.

Last October, they released a report containing 47 "significant questions" about the actions of Pope Pius XII and the Vatican during this era.

They also requested access to unpublished Vatican documents pertaining to the war.

On June 21, the president of the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews, Walter Cardinal Kasper, issued a response.

He informed the historians that an examination of post-1923 Vatican archives would be impossible due to "technical reasons."

Asking them to prepare a final report, he referred them to Rev. Gumpel, who has promoted the beatification of Pope Pius XII.

Some historians claim that Pope Pius XII was largely indifferent to Nazi Germany's persecution of Jews, both before and during the Holocaust.

By way of response, the historians, including Marrus, suspended their probe.

They explained that they could not maintain their credibility as impartial scholars unless the Vatican offered them full access to its archives.

Expressing regret over Rev. Gumpel's blast, Marrus said, "I know of no campaign against the Church. This is a distraction."

The historians, Jews and Catholics, have sincerely tried to uncover the truth, he noted.

"Our effort was made in the most respectful and restrained way. Is it a 'slanderous campaign?' Nothing could be further from the truth."

Marrus, who is also dean of graduate studies at the University of Toronto, has no idea which Vatican officials authorized Rev. Gumpel to denounce the historians' commission.

"I would hope he is not speaking for the Vatican. Maybe this is a matter that will take time to resolve. The story isn't over yet."

Rev. Gumpel, he added, "is not a friend of our effort," and his views are well known.

"We've done the best we can with the materials available to us. It's in everyone's interest that research be allowed to continue."

Interviewed from New York City, Reich described Rev. Gumpel's attack as "baseless, irresponsible and without foundation."

He said he was mystified and sorry that the Vatican's press office had chosen Rev. Gumpel to be its spokesman on this matter.

Rev. Gumpel, Reich said, is not an objective observer, since his goal is Pope Pius XII's beatification.

By Reich's reckoning, Rev. Gumpel's comments were a clear attempt to thwart free access to Vatican archives.

Asked if Pope John Paul II, the incumbent, was behind Rev. Gumpel's denunciation, Reich observed: "The buck stops at the Pope's door. I hope he'll override the decisions of these people and will agree to open the archives."

BICYCLING FOR CHARITY:

A jubilant group of seven high school students from Upper Canada College and Northern Secondary School take a break on reaching Toronto on the final leg of their trip from Vancouver last week. The 17- and 18-year-olds spent a month bicycling the 4,439 kilometres to raise money for Kids Help Phone and Casa Guatemala, an orphanage in rural Guatemala. The brainchild of Alex Salzman, fourth from left, the project raised almost $20,000. Completing the trip felt awesome, said Jonathan Sherman (to the right of Salzman). Donations are still being accepted.

A weak, craven leader

As of this writing, Israeli security and municipal workers are cleaning up the shards of shattered glass and remnants of crushed concrete from the second suicide bombing in four days to strike at the country. Thankfully though, the only bits of singed or sundered flesh they are collecting are those of the bomber alone. Though more than 20 people were hurt Sunday in the blast at a coffeehouse in Kiryat Motzkin, no one but the man carrying the bomb was killed.

This time, the murderer dispatched by Islamic Jihad failed.

That cannot be said, alas, in grim, painful contrast, to the bombing that wiped away the lives of 15 people last Thursday in Jerusalem. Then, Hamas achieved its purpose: the wanton slaughter of Jews.

Of course, they delighted in claiming credit both for the deed and for the "holy warrior" whom they recruited and trained specially for their bloody purpose. At first, however, there was some confusion, because Islamic Jihad had also claimed credit for the slaughter. Indeed, they even published a photo of their own "holy warrior," now gone to his beautifully appointed murderers' hotel in paradise. After some embarrassment, Islamic Jihad acknowledged the error, and admitted the duplication was simply due to an honest mistake on their part.

It was but further evidence, as if more evidence were needed, that the grotesque along with the ghoulish is deeply embedded in the national liberation strategy of the Palestinian leadership.

Yasser Arafat responded to the Thursday slaughter by condemning "violence on all sides" and by cynically calling for a cooling-off period that would lead to an internationally monitored ceasefire.

Israel responded with a combination of selective military and administrative measures that resulted in no loss of life, the most significant of which was the closing of Orient House in east Jerusalem.

Israel's message to Arafat was clear. The Palestinian people stand to lose a great deal if he does not end the violence. And let there be no doubt. He does indeed have it within his power to end most if not all of the violence. The violence would end quickly were he only to order it so.

Arafat is responsible for the situation that hovers now precariously on the brink of a wider Palestinian-Israeli conflagration. Countless times, publicly and on paper, he promised to forever spurn violence. His award of the Nobel Prize for Peace was predicated on those promises. But he lied each time. His lies, it became clear one year ago at Camp David, were all part of his plan.

He lied to the people of Israel. He lied to the people of the United States. He lied to the Norwegian Parliament. Perhaps worst of all though, he continues to lie to his own people, promising them the establishment of their own country on the rubble of Israel.

For his lies and deceit, history will record Yasser Arafat to have been duplicitous and dishonourable. For the misery he brought upon his own people, history will record him to have been a weak, craven and ultimately, unsuccessful leader.

Invitation from Thunder Bay

I was saddened and dismayed upon reading Jeremy Silver's article ("Living in Thunder Bay," CJN, June 28), not because of the ignorance of some non-Jews in this city (every city?) concerning Judaism, but because of the impression that Silver's article might leave with CJN readers with respect to a numerically insignificant (and therefore inactive) Jewish community in this city.

My family and I have lived in Thunder Bay for over 23 years, opening our door and our heart (as have other local Jewish families) to literally hundreds of students, travellers and other Jewish transients. There has never been a Pesach, for example, when our seder has not been attended by students from Confederation College and/or Lakehead University. Every year in late August, I personally arrange for an advertisement to appear in the first issue of each institution's student newspaper, in which Jewish students are welcomed and invited to participate in services at our beautiful synagogue. These ads include a phone number. Our city phone directory has no less than three separate entries for our shul – in the white pages under "S" (for Shaarey...) and under "J" (for Jewish Community Centre), and in the Yellow Pages under "S" (for synagogue). Our synagogue has funded a significant scholarship at Lakehead University, awarded annually to a qualified student.

Over the years, I have observed a great variation in the degree of Jewish community involvement and commitment by Jewish students attending post-secondary institutions in Thunder Bay. Some take initiative, participating in services and working with the city's permanent Jewish community. Others prefer to remain uninvolved and assimilate with their peers. For as long as my wife and I remain here, the front door of our house and synagogue, will always be open to any Jewish (or non-Jewish,) student who seeks to find us – and we're just a phone call away.

So I challenge Silver when he returns this fall: call me up so we can get to know each other, come out to shul services when you can, come over for a bite to eat (kosher yet!), and we can advise you how to acquire matzah for next Pesach. Thunder Bay really isn't that bad a place to live, you know – even as a Jew.

Correcting the record

Ron Csillag's report on the race relations dispute in York Region (CJN, July 26) makes reference to The Holocaust Industry by Norman Finkelstein. Csillag states that "The book... praises pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel's Web site."

Last year, I read Finkelstein's despicable tract, and after reading Csillag's article, could recall no reference to Zundel's Web site. So I reluctantly and carefully re-read the book and confirmed: no reference is made to Zundel or his Web site.

Csillag's incorrect attribution to Finklestein's book undermines the credibility of his critics and strengthens the position of Finklestein and his supporters.

Looking for family I

I am trying to find out about my family, who I believe came from Winnipeg. I am a Canadian war child, born in 1946, 55 years old in August. My mother was an English non-Jew. My father was Sidney Saul Abramovitz, a Canadian serving with the Canadian Air Force in Croydon, England, from 1943 to 1946.

I do not know if my father is still alive now or whether I may have family such as half-brothers and sisters in Canada. I would love to make contact with them if they would have me. I would also like to know my grandparents' and great-grandparents' names. I believe they came from Russia around 1882.

Moroccan Jewry

I found your Through a Sephardi Window column ("Diefenbaker, Moroccan Jewry," CJN, July 26) incomplete. I was directly involved in the events and have a clear recollection of them. In the early '60s (not '50s), I befriended Eli Mimran and his late brother-in-law Albert Niddam, who had just arrived with his mother, wife and children from Morocco via Spain. After I heard their tales of persecution, I felt compelled to try to help. I asked Danny and Rabbi David Monson to obtain an appointment with the Minister of Immigration, Ellen Fairclough, but they were unsuccessful, and after waiting three to four weeks, I received help from my non-Jewish Lakeshore-West MP, who got an appointment for us in Ottawa.

I drove Mimran, Niddim and Rabbi Monson to Ottawa, where we met with George Davidson – the deputy minister of immigration, I believe – who was antipathetic to Rabbi Monson's diplomatic plea for help, offering fatuous excuses for not processing Moroccan Jewish applications, such as, "All security checks had to go through Gibraltar." I became very angry, accused the government of anti-Semitic policies, and threatened to go to the press. Davidson's attitude seemed to change. He accepted a list of 70 families seeking entry for two and more years from Mimram.

Soon after, I befriended an Anglican minister, Rev. Keith Kiddell, who had been appointed Canadian representative to Morocco during the UN Child Refugee Year. I got him to meet Mimran and Niddam, and he became quite interested in our cause, spending several weeks in Morocco. When he returned, I met him in the Montreal airport to take him to a meeting of the Canadian Jewish Congress, and with the late Sam Bronfman and Saul Hayes. Rev. Kiddell continued his goodwill-ambassador role by preaching, writing and soliciting help in many areas.

All 70 families on Mimran's list, I am told, arrived in Canada within months of our Ottawa visit and, thank God, many more thousands followed.

This omission is a gross injustice.

Why Israel is losing the media war

This article is the second of two parts. Part 1 was published last week.

By DAVID MARGOLIS

"A foreign journalist who claims to be 'objective' will be boring or a liar," proclaims Sam Kiley of the London Times. "There are lots of truths in this conflict."

Many would agree that the foreign press is not objective. But if so, why do so many correspondents seem to see the same truth? "They feel they must help the Palestinians," Nirenstein says.

The correspondents don't deny their private judgments. "My sympathies are for the victim," says one, referring to the Palestinians. "The Jews use their history of persecution to make the Americans and Europeans feel sorry for them," objects another, likewise off the record.

Dutch TV's Conny Mus identifies as central "the fact that a mighty army is using all its might to kill a smaller force." Mus goes on to contend that the press presents "an accurate picture" of events and that pro-Israel readers think the news is skewed only because they "don't know what is happening on the Palestinian side."

To an extent he's right – Jews often don't like to see Israel in a bad light, even when the facts are reported accurately. Critics of the media sometimes object to what they regard as "pro-Palestinian" stories merely because they don't like their point of view challenged.

But a report can be accurate and still miss the point. For example, an article may emphasize the number of Palestinian casualties, as if body count is an objective measure, without indicating that the Israeli dead have been mostly innocent civilians, not armed rioters and terrorists. Many journalists simply note Israel's "conquest" of the West Bank, never indicating that this conquest came in a defensive war against Jordan, and that the Palestinians were never sovereign there.

As Andrea Levin of CAMERA, the media-watchdog group, points out, reporters "may cover a story and get the micro issues correct [while] getting the macro issue completely wrong." Nirenstein sees her colleagues romanticizing the Palestinians as David fighting the Israeli Goliath, as if the underdogs are by definition the good guys. That, she writes in the January issue of Commentary magazine, places the journalists - whom she characterizes as "iconoclastic, sporty, ironic, virtually all of one mind" – on the wrong side of the cultural gap between "Western and Eastern civilizations, between democracy and dictatorship, between the Judeo-Christian world and the world of Islam."

The journalists' mindset may also come from what an American-Israeli journalist castigates as "massive ignorance." Many correspondents get little or no preparation time before being dropped into Jerusalem and Ramallah. Once on the ground, they must play catch-up, learning on the job, often from other foreign correspondents.

"We are very superficial," acknowledges the Frankfurter Allgemeine's Jorg Bremer disarmingly. "If we cover the news every day, when do we have time to read a book?" This lack of preparation nearly mandates that correspondents put the template of previous postings onto a situation with a very different history and particulars. CNN's Jerusalem bureau chief Mike Hanna, for example, has been characterized by novelist Naomi Ragen and others as hard-wired by his 20 years as a correspondent in South Africa to see the situation in Israel in terms of "black and white" – the oppressor and the oppressed.

But issues of journalistic judgment and private sensibility are one thing. Lurking behind them is the larger question of whether reportorial sympathy slips into outright bias – and if bias then becomes purposeful manipulation of the news.

Troubling incidents of misreporting and underreporting abound. Media watchdog groups have accused The New York Times, Los Angeles Times and London Times, along with the Washington Post, CNN, Sky News, Reuters, the BBC and other outlets of editing news stories to minimize Palestinian misdemeanours and emphasize Israeli ones, to shift sympathy away from Israel or to make Israel look like the aggressor. The media have also been charged with ignoring stories that supply context crucial to understanding the facts when such stories show the Palestinians in a less than positive light.

Such largely ignored subjects include accounts of Palestinian Red Crescent ambulances carting rocks and Molotov cocktails to flashpoints, the purposeful use of civilians as cover by Palestinian combatants, Palestinian encouragement, and even busing of children to join violent demonstrations and the staging of "spontaneous demonstrations" for optimal media coverage (and the failure of reporters to describe them as staged). There is also the ceaseless incitement of hatred against Jews and Israelis in the Palestinian (and other Arab) media, which many correspondents and their editors view, astonishingly, as irrelevant to the national conflict they are reporting.

Many media outlets, moreover, promulgate as fact their own views on political questions that remain in dispute. The Independent and CNN, for example, routinely call Israeli settlements "illegal under international law," although the issue is not clear. Reuters, its bureau in Jerusalem staffed by a high percentage of Palestinian journalists, now refers to Gilo, a neighbourhood incorporated by Israel into municipal Jerusalem, as a "settlement," giving a radical Palestinian take on the issue.

Do such choices reflect political bias? Journalistic negligence? Lack of historical context inherent in a culture of sound bites? A useful glimpse at the unpalatable "other side of the story"? Or even a slanting of coverage by the international networks, such as CNN and BBC, to help them "penetrate" Arab and Muslim media markets?

The journalist's worldview wafts outward from the TV and the newspaper. Consumers of the news may not know that they are getting a partial story – even if they recognize that any story repeated often enough will, like blanket advertising, finally leave its mark on the public mind.

But it's not just the other guy's fault. If Israel is losing the crucial second war of media coverage, the woeful inadequacy of its hasbara – its efforts at explaining its policies – is also to blame, and has been a problem discussed but not dealt with effectively for many years.

Ironically, in their shoptalk, even staunchly pro-Israel journalists sing the PA's praises. "A gem in the hands of the media," says David Bedein, whose Israel Media Resources agency is commonly associated with the Israeli right. Bedein praises especially the PA's accessibility and openness.

Matthew Kelman, a correspondent for USA Today, calls the PA "a pleasure to deal with. Their officials offer to help, they're easy to deal with, they give easy access, they're more friendly and warm than the Israelis – and they have better stories."

Nobody says anything like that about Israel's media apparatus. On the contrary – and off the record – reporters who care agree that Israel "couldn't be doing a worse job" of hasbara, as one of them puts it.

"The spokespeople don't know how to talk to the camera," he says with exasperation. "They have poor English, they often appear in uniform, which makes them seem like part of the problem, and they speak in bombastic, self-righteous terms."

Another calls Israeli media officials "prickly" and complains, "They don't call back, they leak information selectively, and they sometimes don't release information even when they have it."

A third narrates an encounter with a ministry press officer who, citing a court's gag order, refused him information for an article he was writing. A few days later he saw the information in a Hebrew weekly. "The press guy didn't even know the gag order had been lifted," he fumes.

Reasons for the hasbara's ineffectiveness include budget cuts, especially in the Government Press Office; bureaucratic infighting between the Prime Minister's Office, the GPO and individual ministries; overwork, arrogance and plain incompetence. "Israel doesn't realize the effect," sighs a reporter.

"Our story is very complex to deliver," protests the prime minister's media chief, Ranaan Gissin, "while their story lends itself to simple treatment."

He admits that Israel's hasbara has suffered from "technical problems," including inadequate spokespeople. But now, he promises, "I am sending people who can deliver," and he says he has made other changes to improve Israel's performance in the media war.

It may not be enough. While Israel's GPO simply issues each new journalist a press card and lets him fend for himself, says Steven Rosenberg, editor of the Boston Jewish Advocate, the Palestinians will approach him offering a wide network of help.

"When background information, photos, interviews and briefings are readily abundant," Rosenberg points out, "it makes a reporter's life much easier."

Such guidance can also shape the reporter's understanding of the events he's writing about.

Israel's current foreign minister, Shimon Peres, is famously quoted as remarking that a good policy requires no hasbara while a bad policy can't be helped by hasbara.

That may be true in a perfect world. So far as fighting the media war is concerned, Israel doesn't yet seem to realize that it isn't living in a perfect world.

Media Watchdogs

- The granddaddy of Israel-oriented media-watchdog groups is CAMERA, the Committee for Accountability in Middle East Reporting in America. Driven by the notion that "public opinion ultimately shapes public policy," it operates a Web site and archives, runs ads in major media markets and complains directly to journalists and publishers (and urges its members to do the same). Address: Box 428, Boston, MA, 02456; Internet: http://world.std.com/~camera.
- HonestReporting.com, a project of the Aish HaTorah yeshiva organization, emails its thousands of subscribers worldwide, alerting them to media reports it considers biased against Israel and asks them, if they agree, to protest. The volume of mail generated has made some editors feel under assault.
- The Philadelphia branch of the Zionist Organization of America monitors and analyzes bias in the area media and publishes a bimonthly column on bias in The Jewish Exponent, a Philadelphia weekly. Web site: www.netreach.net/~zoa.
- Israel-mediaimage, an e-mail discussion group accessible through www.yahoo.com, focuses on what it considers inaccuracies and bias and cultivates dialogue with journalists.
- Based in Jerusalem, Palestinian Media Watch (www.pmw.org.il), monitors Palestinian television, radio and newspapers and provides well-researched reports on current trends, from the stepped-up use of violent footage in televised propaganda to the common use of anti-Semitic "clues" in newspaper crossword puzzles.
- MEMRI, the Middle East Media and Research Institute, at www.memri.org, offers translations and analysis of reports from the Arab media.
- Fairness and Accuracy in Reporting (FAIR) is not solely concerned with the Middle East, but when it looks at Middle East reporting in the United States, it generally sees an unfairly pro-Israel, anti-Palestinian tilt. Address: 130 W. 25 St., New York, NY, 10001; Internet: www.fair.org.

Camp visit

Don't be turned off by the title to this column, for the camp I am talking about is not a site that used to be a concentration camp – quite the contrary. It is a camp for young people to spend several months in an environment that advances their knowledge of Judaism.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Camp George, which it was my privilege to see for the first time, is such a place. I use it here, not in order to advance ideology – in this case Reform Judaism – but to reinforce in your hearts and minds the importance of giving young people an opportunity to appreciate the faith and culture of our people.

The visit brought out memories of my younger years. My late brother, Rabbi Walter Plaut, was the founder of Herzl Camp in Minnesota, and I myself was present at the founding of Camp Oconomowoc in Wisconsin, outside of Milwaukee. I was therefore not unfamiliar with the atmosphere and sounds and environment of a camp, but since I had not visited one for a very long time, the homecoming made a powerful impression.

I know how difficult education is in general and how especially difficult it is to imbue our children with an appreciation of their Jewish heritage. The values it promotes are often in conflict with the consumerism of North American civilization, which is founded on the satisfaction of individual desire and has all too few elements of communal impact.

Not surprisingly, young people who later become educators or rabbis have often been inspired in their youth by the opportunity to attend camp.

Of course, the few weeks that the youngsters spend there, while important in themselves, have not always had a lasting significance in their lives. Much depends on what meets them when they come home: how Shabbat and holidays are observed, what kinds of books and other materials that relate to Judaism they encounter. Often when there is such a confluence, the parents themselves are infected by the enthusiasm of their offspring and the foundation for a meaningful Jewish life has been laid.

At any rate, I was inspired not only by the beauty of the camp's location, but by the vigorous expression of Judaism that I experienced. It made me feel good, and somehow the long automobile trek, which ordinarily is not to my liking, did not create the annoyance I had feared. On the contrary, I was immensely grateful to those who had urged me to go and make the visit, and I advise you to seek every opportunity to visit a Jewishly oriented summer camp if at all possible, one that not only helps the kids pass their days away from home in a healthy environment, but also transmits values that enrich their lives.

Time to end 'victim mentality'

As Canadians, we are accustomed to viewing ourselves as victims – victims of colonialism, of American domination, of climate, of mediocre politicians. As Jews, we often perceive ourselves solely as history's victim, endlessly suffering from wars, one holocaust after another, Arab hatred and home-grown anti-Semitism.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

"If your mythology denigrates you," writes John Ralston Saul in Reflections of a Siamese Twin: Canada at the End of the Twentieth Century, "you will be limited by it, what ever your talents."

Mythologies can be true memories of actual events; they can cripple, making us feel we are powerless to change things, as true power belongs only to the persecutor, the enemy. Are we limited by our mythologies?

"The victim," writes Saul, "sees all events through his own prism… As the one to whom things have been done, the victim has no responsibility beyond his immediate concerns… Nor is there room for non-victims among those identified as belonging to the group victimized."

Saul was talking about Canada. But what he says can easily apply to us. Now I hear you asking, "What right do you have to degrade our suffering or make it of little account? Do we not bleed?"

Indeed, Jews have bled, and the petty would-be tyrants who have told us we act as if we alone have been victims usually have a darker agenda. Never mind them. Look at us.

The Middle East is a perfect example of how two groups, feeling equally victimized, fall over and over again into bloody shooting matches. "Look at us," the Palestinians scream. "We are the victims of a bogus nationalism that has no legitimate right to exist."

"Aha," Israel responds. "You deny us our history of suffering and our right to be here."

Fear and anger are the causes, and the results, of the present impasse. The two sides are like Siamese twins, stuck tightly together and incapable of pulling apart. I do not mean to compare atrocities, but I do point out that each is not hearing the other's real fear and anguish.

In Canada, however, we can understand our own mythology and make changes. Instead of counting the anti-Semitic incidents, real or perceived, in Canada each year, why not realize the ways in which Jews in Canada live in peace and equality with others? Celebrate the total reversal of immigration restrictions from the 1940s to today? Absorb our ability to choose freely our careers, places of residence, places of recreation, education and more? Welcome growing numbers of converts to Judaism, who clearly see its richness and promise? Rejoice in the ability to educate our children in Jewish schools of many varieties?

Jew as victim, in other words, is something we can understand, a comfortable past that we can turn to when we should rather be viewing our accomplishments in one of the world's great democracies – not in arrogance, but in confidence. Let me give examples.

Canadian feminist historian Veronica Strong-Boag, writing on the history of women's lives, portrays the introduction of telephones, washing machines and other mechanical devices into the lives of farm-women as not labour saving, but rather as devices to further enslave women by tying them to domestic chores associated with home appliances. Nothing, it seems, was ever a gift to women's lives. That's what happens when the only tool you have in your historical toolbox is a hammer. Every problem becomes a nail.

Another example. Some Holocaust survivors want to honour "righteous Jews" who, by their actions, saved other Jews. Others object strenuously. Jews can't be heroes in that war, they argue – only victims. Thus, they deny a people's ability to triumph under the worst conditions.

By allowing ourselves to believe we are only victims, what are we teaching our children about being Jewish? Where is the celebration? Worse, we ignore the internal healing that should take place among us and focus entirely on external enemies.

Saul quotes historian Marcel Trudel: "History must serve no cause." In an ideal world, maybe not. In our imperfect world, history will always have to resist the urge to serve a cause. Jews have been victims, but today, we are strong, free and able to control our own destinies. We therefore have a responsibility to lessen the false causes which we force history to serve.

Hopelessness overcomes the Jewish people

As my wife Nancy, my son Joel, the two dogs and I drove into Detroit on the last leg of our Edmonton-to-Windsor adventure, we tuned the radio to National Public Radio, a merciful break from the steady diet of Phish and Moe to which Joel had subjected us over the last 3,500 kilometres.

Bruce Elman in Windsor

The program, already in progress, concerned the psychological effects of the 10-month-old "Al-Aksa Intifadah" on both the Israeli and Palestinian people. I did not hear the entire show, but I already know from my discussions with Israeli friends and my reading of Israeli newspapers that Israeli Jews, who feel that the current situation is intolerable and cannot be allowed to continue, have been overcome by a terrible hopelessness. Overwhelmingly, they believe that an all-out war is inevitable if not imminent.

As I have stated in other columns, our last sabbatical in Jerusalem was, at times, a difficult one. In 1995 and 1996, Israel and world Jewry were caught up in the euphoria of the Oslo accords. There were terrorist attacks, to be sure – the number 9 bus to Mount Scopus exploded shortly after we arrived. In the fall, Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated and the violence escalated. Rabin's successor, Shimon Peres, launched the "Peace for Galilee" Operation. Suicide bombers struck repeatedly in Jerusalem, their favourite target being the number 18 bus, and in Tel Aviv.

When Benjamin Netanyahu, emphasizing security over peace, defeated Peres in the prime ministerial elections, Israel and world Jewry maintained their commitment to the peace process. Hope for a future of peace prevailed.

Our current state of despondency, in my opinion, accelerated dramatically after the June 1st suicide bombing at the Tel Aviv beach nightclub. Tel Aviv, Israel's largest city, is, relatively speaking, far from the territories. It had largely been spared from the effects of both this intifadah and the first one. Unlike Jerusalem, Tel Aviv has, perhaps with the exception of the Gulf War, been a relatively carefree place in which to live – a fun, vibrant and dynamic city. But this cowardly act by an Islamic extremist, which was launched against young olim (new immigrants) who represent Israel's future, was particularly devastating because it brought the "war" to the centre of the country, into Israel's most densely populated area. It showed that no part of Israel is immune from terrorist assaults. The citizens of Tel Aviv now know that they are as vulnerable as anyone living in Jerusalem or Efrat or even Hebron.

The attack also dealt a blow to Israel's crucial tourist industry. And it undoubtedly caused numerous Jewish groups and individuals to cancel their travel plans, thus exacerbating the feelings of abandonment that many Israelis are currently experiencing.

In my view, what is even more disheartening, however, are the results of a Palestinian opinion poll about the intifadah conducted by the Jerusalem Media Center and recently reported in the Israeli daily, Ha'aretz. Though there is always some skepticism with regard to the efficacy of these polls, there are some startling results in this particular one: only 9.2 percent of respondents see the intifadah's goal as being the improvement of the bargaining position. Meanwhile, 45.6 percent see the goal as being an end to Israeli occupation and the creation of a Palestinian State – the declared goal of the Palestinian leadership. Fully 41.2 percent of respondents view the goal as being the complete liberation of all Palestinian land – that is, the destruction of Israel.

The intifadah has often been linked to the existence of Israeli settlements in the territories, yet only a quarter of those surveyed thought that the intifadah should stop if an end is put to them. On the other hand, 67.1 percent of respondents would not agree to end the intifadah even if the settlements are stopped.

The survey also indicated that 53.9 percent of Palestinians oppose the Oslo accords while only 38.1 percent support future peace agreements. Of those surveyed, 79 percent support the intifadah, up from 70 percent last December. Most distressingly, 68.6 percent support suicide attacks such as the recent bombing in Tel Aviv. This is an increase from the 66 percent in April and the 26.1 percent in March of 1999.

Finally, 71.6 percent of those Palestinians who responded to the survey agree with the assertion that Yasser Arafat is in full control of the intifadah.

It is possible to draw many conclusions from this poll. For me, the results are clear – there is no hope of peace at the present time because there is no partner for it. There is, unfortunately, good reason for the hopelessness we feel.

Bush gets sucked into Mideast maelstrom

When George W. Bush assumed the presidency of the United States, senior White House and State Department officials hinted that a new American Middle East policy was in the offing.

Their message was that Washington would no longer be embroiled in the minutiae of Arab-Israeli peacemaking, and that Bush, unlike his predecessor, Bill Clinton, would not lay his prestige on the line as a Mideast mediator.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The Bush administration, they added, would let Israel and the Palestinians settle their differences in direct negotiations.

In an implicit reference to Clinton's failed attempts to bridge the gaps between Ehud Barak and Yasser Arafat, Secretary of State Colin Powell noted that the United States would "assist, not insist."

Chastened by the collapse of the Camp David summit, the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising, the virtual dissolution of the Oslo peace process and the earlier failure of Israel's once-promising peace talks with Syria, the Bush administration lowered expectations of what American diplomacy could realistically achieve in the Mideast.

Henceforth, Bush spokespersons explained, the United States would, in the interests of fostering Mideast stability, put the emphasis on damage control rather than on peacemaking.

And instead of focusing on ending the Arab-Israeli conflict, the modus operandi of previous presidents, ranging from Jimmy Carter to George Bush the elder, Bush would concentrate on containing Iraq by pushing for so-called "smart sanctions."

Six months on, Bush has learned a lesson in the harsh realities of realpolitik.

Buffeted by the escalating violence in the territories and by the Security Council's resistance to fresh United Nations sanctions against Saddam Hussein's regime, the United States has been forced to reassess its hands-off approach to Israel's low-grade war of attrition with the Palestinian Authority.

Realizing that the intifadah could ignite a wider war, and thereby threaten the flow of Mideastern oil, undermine its relations with conservative Arab countries and strengthen the hand of secular and Islamic radical forces, the United States has begun to adopt a hands-on policy.

Washington's stance has the support of Arafat and mainstream Arab leaders, such as President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt, King Abdullah II of Jordan and Prime Minister Rafik Hariri of Lebanon. Rightly or wrongly, they believe that greater U.S. involvement will yield political concessions from Israel. For precisely this reason, right-wing Israeli politicians are less than enthusiastic about the United States' volte face.

The Bush administration's position, a nod to the past, has evolved gradually.

Edward Walker, the undersecretary of state and former ambassador to Israel, disclosed in mid-April that the United States would become more involved in the region so as to restore quiet as a condition for renewing Israel's ruptured dialogue with the Palestinian Authority.

In this spirit, Bush rallied behind the recommendations of the Sharm al Sheikh Fact-Finding Committeee, chaired by ex-U.S. senator George Mitchell. The report, which both Israel and the Palestinians have accepted, calls for an unconditional ceasefire, followed by a meaningful cooling-off period and confidence-building measures in advance of a resumption of negotiations.

In a bid to implement the report, the key to defusing the intifadah, Bush has taken several significant steps to upgrade the United States' profile in Mideast diplomacy.

The Central Intelligence Agency, known colloquially as the CIA, has returned as an observer to Israel's on-again-off-again security talks with the Palestinians.

During the last phases of the Clinton era, the CIA played a crucial role in monitoring compliance with the Oslo accords. Bush relieved the CIA of these duties shortly after he became president. But with the intensification of the intifadah in the spring, he had a change of heart.

On May 21, the United States got even further involved when Powell announced the appointment of a special envoy to the region. William Burns, the appointee, was ambassador to Jordan and is now assistant secretary for Near Eastern Affairs. His task, essentially, is to flesh out the Mitchell report. Burns' deputy, David Satterfield, the former ambassador to Lebanon, will assist him.

Bush's decision to name a special envoy to the Mideast was indicative of Washington's fear that the intifadah is spinning out of control and threatens the region's stability, such as it is. It will be recalled that Bush, in his first days in office, cavalierly dispensed with the services of special envoy Dennis Ross, whom his father and Clinton learned to respect.

In the wake of the June 1 suicide bombing of a Tel Aviv disco, which claimed the lives of 21 Israelis, Bush stepped deeper into the Mideast morass by asking CIA director George Tenet to hammer out a sustainable truce. On June 13, after considerable arm twisting, he produced a working plan. The ceasefire exists in name only, having been honoured in the breach by Palestinian violations and Israeli reprisals.

Like his predecessors, Powell has discovered that the Arab-Israeli dispute is a minefield. In late June, in his second visit to the area since February, he flew to the Middle East to shore up the shaky ceasefire. His mission was a resounding failure.

George Bush

Before Powell's departure, Bush tried but failed to convince Prime Minister Ariel Sharon that the violence was dying down. Bush soon abandoned that view. Anxious to move beyond the ceasefire phase of the Mitchell report, he subscribed to a Group of Eight declaration last month urging the deployment of third-party observers to monitor the June 13 truce. After consultations with Israel, the United States said that about 10 U.S. monitors would be dispatched to the territories after the violence ceases. (The Palestinians, however, are holding out for an international monitoring force, an idea Washington opposes).

Bush, in striving for a lasting ceasefire to reinvigorate Oslo, has publicly blasted the Palestinians for failing to abide by the truce. At the same time, a State Department report has condemned the Palestinian Authority for deliberately provoking and perpetrating acts of terror against Israel. As a result, Bush has yet to invite Arafat to the White House.

By contrast, Bush has twice invited Sharon since March. At their first meeting, there was a confluence of interests. To Sharon's satisfaction, they agreed that peace talks could not take place while fighting raged. As Bush put it, talks could not be resumed until "the cycle of violence is crushed and broken."

Although Sharon has generally managed to establish cordial ties with Bush, and Powell has asserted that the United States' relationship with Israel will "remain rock solid," there have been strains.

In mid-April, after the Palestinians fired mortars into Sderot, a town in the northern Negev, Israel responded by attacking Palestinian bases in the adjoining Gaza Strip, and an Israeli military spokesman said that Israel might stay on there for "days, weeks and months." By way of reaction, the State Department described Israel's brief incursion as "excessive and disproportionate."

Then, in May, after Israel conducted a series of lightning retaliatory raids into Area A of the West Bank, which is fully controlled by the Palestinian Authority, the United States accused Israel of escalating the conflict.

Apart from these critiques, and its opposition to Israel's settlement policy in the territories, the United States has been critical of Israel's practice of "targeted killings," or the assassination of Palestinian militants. Most recently, Washington characterized Israel's killing of two Hamas leaders in Nablus as "highly excessive and reprehensible." (In a dissent, Vice-President Dick Cheney expressed understanding for Israel's policy of seeking out and eradicating Palestinians planning bombings). Washington also censured Israel for deploying F-16s in a raid on Palestinian installations in Nablus. It did not, however, criticize Israel for bombing Palestinian police headquarters in Ramallah after the Aug. 9 Hamas suicide bombing in Jerusalem.

Despite its criticism of Israeli policies, the Bush administration has reaffirmed the United States' "special relationship" with Israel and promised to maintain Israel's qualitative military edge over the Arabs.

Bush, though, has reneged on his election campaign promise to transfer the U.S. embassy to Jerusalem. On June 12, he signed a waiver postponing the move.

As well, Bush has decided to defer Israel's request for $800 million in supplemental aid. Israel currently receives about $3 billion a year in military and economic aid from the United States, the single largest recipient of American assistance.

It's mummies' time

The Mummy Congress: Science, Obsession, and the Everlasting Dead*, by Heather Pringle, Penguin.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Mummies have become big business. The modern media strive to serve up a steady diet of mummy movies, mummy documentaries, mummy television specials, mummy advertisements, mummy Web sites, mummy posters – and, of course, mummy books.

The popular image of the mummy is the exquisitely decorated Egyptian pharaoh in his tomb. Egypt, however, is only the tip of the mummy iceberg – hundreds have been found in the bogs of northern Europe, thousands in the deserts of South America, Central Asia and the American Southwest.

Cold temperatures in the Arctic, the Andes and other mountains have preserved prehistoric men (such as the spectacular "Iceman," a 3,000-year-old hunter found in the Alps.)

Mummy sites exist in Siberia, Denmark, the Canary Islands, North Africa, Chile and Peru.

Not all mummies are ancient (witness the discovery recently of famous mountaineer George Mallory, who disappeared on Mount Everest in 1929), and the bizarre 20th-century revival under communism (Lenin, Stalin and Ho Chi Minh were all mummified).

Heather Pringle is a Vancouver science writer and journalist. When the editor of Discover magazine suggested she attend a gathering of mummy enthusiasts in Northern Chile, she was sceptical and apprehensive. The assignment seemed weird and outlandish.

What she found, however, was a gathering of passionate mummy lovers from around the globe who soon converted her to the lure and mystery of the mummy – how they're made, where they're found and what historians and scientists learn from them.

A newly created mummyphile, Pringle spent the next year travelling around the world in search of mummies and eager to interview leading scientists about them.

She discovered that for decades the world's mummy experts had been recovering ancient preserved bodies in a host of unlikely places, from ghoulish-looking bog bodies submerged in Dutch fens to pristine mummies of saints exhibited in Italian churches; and from Inca children sacrificed on Andean mountain peaks, to Buddhist monks venerated in Japanese temples. Indeed, every continent on earth, it seemed, had once possessed its share of mummies.

Pringle writes that in years to come, medical researchers struggling to outwit all manner of deadly parasites – from viruses to bacteria, rickettsia to amoeba, fungi to protozoa – could turn to the mummified dead in search of new weapons.

Sealed in their preserved cells is an astonishing molecular archive of disease, a record of misery and malady far more ancient and far more complete than any noted on rice paper, papyri, clay tablets or stone.

In a surprising chapter, Pringle discusses the "miraculously" preserved bodies of little known Catholic saints. She visits European churches with an Italian scientist and learns of the pious duplicity and manifold pitfalls involved in the process of confirming the incorruptibility of the body.

"Influenced, perhaps by such discoveries, the Roman Catholic Church has now virtually abandoned the old notion of incorruptibility," she writes.

Although the Hebrew Scriptures mention the embalming of Jacob and Joseph, who both died in Egypt, the practice is prohibited in Judaism.

Filled with extraordinary photographs, astonishing stories and little-known information, as well as accounts of an eclectic group of scientist-adventurers who reconstruct the dead, this book is popular science writing at its best.

Elul on the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Ani ledodi vedodi li (I am to my beloved and my beloved is to me)
— Song of Songs 6:3

Although this beautiful phrase has adorned many ketubot and wedding rings, it takes on special significance at this time of year. The first letters of Ani ledodi vedodi li form the Hebrew acronym "Elul," the special month of repentance that proceeds Rosh Hashanah and begins on the evening of Sunday, August 19. Today, some information about Elul and the Internet.

The two lovers that are referred to in Ani ledodi are the Jewish people and God. During Elul, they solidify their relationship as the Jewish people address their beloved and repent for any wrongs done. God, in turn, repays the gesture and forgives His beloved [http://www.inner.org/times/elul/elul.htm].

There are many other metaphors used for the relationship between the Jewish people and God during this time of year. For example, Arnie Davis explains how mystics refer to Elul as "the time the king is in the field." Before Rosh Hashanah, God, the king, leaves His palace to survey His workers in the fields. That makes him particularly approachable with requests for the coming year [http://www.jewishmag.com/13mag/elul/elul.htm].

There are a number of special traditions that are linked with Elul. Starting this month, Psalm 27, Le David Hashem ori (The Lord is my light), is recited twice daily [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/elul/elul.htm]. Also this month, we begin to blow the shofar on weekdays to inspire ourselves to use the opportunity of Elul to the fullest before Rosh Hashanah comes. You can listen to a shofar and learn more at 613.org [http://www.613.org/roshyomkippursuccot.html]. And Slichot, penitential prayers, are recited daily (except for Shabbat) by Sephardim from the first day of Elul until Yom Kippur. Ashkenazim begin very early on a Sunday morning at least four days before Rosh Hashanah [http://www.jhom.com/calendar/ elul/].

Did you know that there's a big birthday being celebrated in Elul? It's the world's. According to the prevailing Jewish thought, the world wasn't created on Rosh Hashanah. Rosh Hashanah actually commemorates the creation of man and woman on the sixth day. So count backwards in your calendar. The creation of the world was actually on the 25th of Elul. For more Elul anniversaries, go to the Torah.net Web site [http://torah.net/eng/kids/month/elul.htm].

Impressions about Elul and Rosh Hashanah in Israel versus Elul and Rosh Hashanah in the Diaspora are made in an article by Haviva Ner-David, who, before having moved to Israel, felt ambivalent about living in a culture that celebrated New Year's in the middle of winter. It was a time "stuck in the middle of a period of little hope nor freshness nor renewal," she writes. "Now that that conflict is gone, I feel finally comfortable to let myself be carried away by the 'New Year' spirit. It's an all-pervading spirit that can be quite refreshing and empowering." [http://www.jfImail. com/articles/452.html].

"In Judaism we are given many opportunities to recharge our batteries," Ner-David concludes. "There's a weekly renewal, Shabbat; a monthly renewal, Rosh Chodesh; and a yearly renewal, Rosh Hashanah. What a precious gift to be reminded so often that we human beings have the power to forge our own paths."

Seniors explore their creative side

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Before starting art lessons three months ago, Rose Edelist had never held a paintbrush in her hand.

Yet just recently, to her surprise, she sold a painting.

A resident of Forest Hill Place, Edelist, 93, who had a stroke two years ago, was one of the 11 men and women residents, both amateur and professional artists, who recently displayed their works at an exhibit at the retirement residence.

"I started taking art lessons three months ago because I wanted to be active," Edelist says.

A lover of music and dancing, she is now in a wheelchair with the use of only one hand and says, "Painting makes me feel great. I really enjoy it."

Edelist and the other residents have been taking art instruction twice a month with artist Martha Johnson of the Avenue Road Art School.

"I couldn't draw a straight line and I failed art at Westmount High School in Montreal," Frances Wintrob, 87, says. A resident of Forest Hill for a year, she adds, "If you had asked me if my art work would be hanging at an art show, I would have said, 'Are your kidding?'"

Wintrob, who devoted her life to community volunteer work, including serving as president of the Women's Auxiliary at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care from 1966 to 1968, says, "I now wanted to do something for myself."

To her surprise, three of her paintings were sold.

"I really wanted to keep them but people wanted them. It was so exciting and never in my wildest dreams did I think I would paint, let alone sell my paintings."

She says that she got a sense of accomplishment as a volunteer, "but this is a sense of accomplishment in a different area. This is for me. I have learned to appreciate what you see when you look at a picture.'

Seventy-eight year old resident Evelyn Schaffer, a professional artist who moved to Forest Hill Place from Montreal, has had many group and private exhibitions in Montreal. Working in watercolours and oils as well as pastels, her work reflects an innocence and serenity. A number of her paintings were sold at the exhibition.

"I will continue studying here and at the Avenue Road Art School," she says.

"It's wonderful to have interactive painting programs which allow the residents to develop and explore different and changing talents and interests," says Forest Hill Place Marketing Manager, Gwen Mackay-Smith.

"At our recent art exhibit, the artists were extremely proud of their work and gained much confidence and self assurance."

"It is enjoyable working with seniors as they develop their style of painting and drawing," Johnson says. "For most, taking art classes is an extension of their creative talents or a lifelong passion that's just being realized."

Mother's victory is bittersweet

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Gail Manis with her two children.

TORONTO — Now that her former husband is serving six months in jail, Gail Manis can have a little peace.

"It's a bittersweet victory, though," says Manis, 44, the mother of an 11-year-old daughter and a four-year-old son.

Warren Manis, 45, originally from Montreal, was recently sentenced to jail for disobeying a judge's orders to remove his former wife's name from a $90,000 – plus interest – line of credit, and to provide sufficient security to get her name off a $300,000 mortgage on their Toronto home.

Warren declared bankruptcy last April, although according to court documents, "he did not deprive himself of a lifestyle that accompanies that of being a chartered accountant [and] a licensed security dealer, both [designations] of which he stands to lose as a result of this bankruptcy."

Evidence shows that when the couple separated in January 1997, his worth was about $1.7 million.

Gail – also originally from Montreal – who is currently undergoing chemotherapy for breast cancer that has metastasized to her bones, was forced to sell her house after the Royal Bank of Canada started power of sale proceedings. She and her children have to be out of the house this month.

After paying the property taxes, which, with arrears, total about $50,000, and after paying the real estate commission, she will get nothing from the house.

She is in debt "up to her eyeballs," and has to find a place to live, "but it's hard to plan my life while I'm on chemotherapy. I'm so tired; I can't do what I used to do. Even something as simple as shopping has to be planned.

"I get notices from the bank and I get bills, but they can't get blood from a stone," she says.

Avra Rosen, Gail's lawyer, says she has been in family law since 1987, "and this is one of my worst files. It broke my heart.

"It absolutely wore Gail out, but she kept going. He made her go all the way. When her health changed, instead of being more lenient on her, he became more aggressive," says Rosen.

At one point, Warren – against a judge's orders to maintain his family's existing health and medical plans – had changed plans, and when Gail became ill, she discovered she was not eligible for coverage. She was faced with drug costs of about $1,000 a month, and it was only after an order from a subsequent judge that Warren paid the medical bills.

Because Warren has declared bankruptcy, says Rosen, he is technically debt free. "He can come out of jail wiping his hands. His daughter has to leave the Hebrew day school she has always attended, and they have to leave their home, but nothing has changed for him.

"Gail, whose father is a Holocaust survivor, did not want her children to feel that she sent their father to jail, but she could not see any other way. He had to know there were serious consequences for what he did.

"He did it all out of spite, and he hurt his children the most. He could not think beyond his own world, and he never took the extra step to see what impact his actions would have on his children and former wife," says Rosen.

Gail says she served her husband with divorce papers in February 1997, "and he flipped. It was the beginning of the horrific legal battle. I always knew the marriage was rocky, but I did not think he would go this far.

"After I became ill, he put forward a motion to obtain sole custody of the children. He tried to take my kids away when I needed them most.

"There was nothing more important to him than control, and this is how he got it. It is definitely irrational for him to be hurting his children like this. He took away their basic necessities of life.

"I can change my name, but they will always have to live with his," she says.

"It's been a story from hell, but I feel some relief that the judicial system has provided some justice. I can move on with my life and take comfort from my children. [Even though] I'm living with a terminal illness that looms over me, I'm not thinking about my prognosis; I'm just trying to live the best I can.

"I am looking forward to moving on, getting my children settled into a new home and a new lifestyle in a place that will be our own. I want to enjoy my children, do things as a family, and take what life offers us.

"The whole experience has made me stop and reflect. I have a fantastic support network [which] has really come through, and many people have called to say they feel saddened for me. It's nice to know that people empathize."

Meanwhile, she says, "I can provide my children with nurturing and common sense; they just won't get the extras. They will get through the whole experience, but a lot of it was unnecessary. Everything [Warren] did was voluntary. He chose not to abide by the courts.

"Whether he will learn a lesson from all of this is yet to be seen."

KIDS CARE TOO WALKATHON: Children are mindful of the concerns regarding cancer and are quick to respond to the fight against the disease. Some 150 campers, ranging in age from four to 12, from the City of Toronto Mitchell Field and Earl Bales Area Day Camps recently participated in a fund-raising walk at Earl Bales Park and raised a total of $4,000 for cancer research and services. One enthusiastic five-year-old from Edithvale Preschool Camp collected $350 towards the event. The children have also increased their knowledge of cancer and taken action to reduce their risk following presentations of Safety in the Sun by trained volunteers of the North York unit of the Canadian Cancer Society.

Music is Silverman's second language

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sarah Silverman, winner of Temple Sinai's 2001 Ben Steinberg Musical Legacy Award, sees music as a second language.

"I read music just like I read a book. It's something I have always taken for granted," she says.

Silverman, 21, a student at Glenn Gould Professional School of Music – where she majors in piano and minors in voice – is the 18th winner of the award which includes a $1,000 scholarship towards her tuition.

She was presented with the award when she was featured at a special spring recital held at the temple.

Silverman, a graduate of Vaughan Secondary School, comes by her musical talent honestly, she says.

Her father Howard, a jazz drummer and pianist, has travelled with Dizzie Gillespie and played in Moe Kaufman's band. Her mother Maureen, who is now a midwife, trained as a classical violinist and has played with the National Ballet Orchestra and the Canadian Opera Company Orchestra.

Sarah Silverman

"I spent a lot of time at rehearsals with my mother, and I often harmonized with my dad. I started violin lessons with my mother when I was three, and then switched to piano when I was five.

"I loved playing, but I hated practising; a couple of times I almost quit. My parents, however, never forced me to keep going," she says.

"I was heavily into dance and theatre" – her professional debut was in Fiddler on the Roof at the Leah Posluns Theatre when she was 14 – "and all of it took up all of my time. I now practise piano four to six hours a day."

As a pianist, she has won a number of awards, including Most Outstanding Pianist of 1998 and the James Anagnoson – her teacher since she was 15 years old – and Leslie Kinton scholarship at the Newmarket Lions Festival. She was also awarded top prize and a scholarship in the concert class of this year's Toronto Kiwanis Festival.

Although she is majoring in classical piano, and in two more years could begin a master's degree, she is also interested in jazz and vocal.

"I also have a passion for theatre and dance, but this is the first time I am focusing on one thing. I chose classical piano because it is fun and I am good at it. It comes naturally to me.

"Some day I can see [myself] doing some piano, some vocal, some jazz, some musical theatre; maybe I will direct or choreograph. I will take each path where it leads, as long as I'm happy."

The more she studies classical piano, she says, "the higher the levels I reach, and the more rewarding it becomes. I feel like I never knew what I was doing, and now I know how to listen to music.

"There is a power to classical music that you don't find in most music other than jazz. Classical music is emotional and intelligent at the same time. I listen now for harmonies and for how the music is put together. That changes how I hear things.

"The music hits me right at my core. When I listen to classical music I get a welling up of happiness and I listen to it over and over."

She credits Anagnoson for teaching her about music. "He is a valid critic and he has a positive attitude. He totally opened my eyes to the different levels of music."

Her favourite pianists, she says, are Martha Argerich, who she just discovered last year, and Krystian Zimerman.

Her Temple Sinai concert, which she performed on a Steinway piano, included pieces by Johannes Brahms, Johann Sebastian Bach, Julius Wolfson, Ludwig Von Beethoven, Aaron Copland, Jean Coulthard and two pieces by Ben Steinberg. She was accompanied by Joel Katz on the bass.

Rabbi comes home to share Kolel leadership

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — He's travelled from Australia to Hong Kong and back again, but Rabbi Jordan Cohen finds there's no place like home. A native Torontonian, he returns this month after 21 years away to take over from Outreach Director Rabbi Neal Loevinger at the Kolel Centre for Liberal Jewish Education.

Rabbi Jordan Cohen and his son, Zachary, 10.

Founded in 1991 by director Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, Kolel offers serious text-based study with a liberal edge. Since its inception, Kolel has gone through several phases, and Rabbi Cohen's arrival – with 10 years of rabbinic experience behind him – promises to usher in yet another.

According to Rabbi Loevinger, Kolel's first major turning point was adding a second full-time rabbi, opening up a wealth of viewpoints and styles far surpassing "the efforts of just one individual, no matter how talented."

Then, last year, Kolel purchased a building on Eglinton Avenue. That move, he says, "identified Kolel as a place to go," rather than a loose collection of classes and programs.

When Rabbi Cohen steps in, he'll also take on a new title. As associate director, he'll not only perform Rabbi Loevinger's duties, but also – thanks to his years of congregational experience – assume a leadership role alongside Rabbi Goldstein. This new step will further assure Kolel's place as a full-fledged adult education program.

Rabbi Goldstein, who writes and most recently edited The Women's Torah Commentary (Jewish Lights Publishing, 2000), calls Rabbi Cohen "more of a peer" than previous rabbis. She says sharing leadership responsibilities will give her the opportunity to offer more advanced classes as well as to embrace new book projects.

Rabbi Loevinger

Unaffiliated with any movement, Kolel draws instructors and staff from all backgrounds. In the past year, Kolel has offered programs taught by Reform, Conservative and Orthodox laypeople and rabbis, mirroring the diversity of Kolel students, many of whom Rabbi Loevinger describes as "Jews in transition," moving towards greater involvement.

Rabbi Loevinger himself may be one of Kolel's earliest success stories. Though only at Kolel full time since his ordination in 1999, he's actually been around since the beginning. Originally from Baltimore, he began studying Jewish ethics for his graduate degree in environmental studies at York University. Under Rabbi Goldstein's guidance, he decided to enter the rabbinate, returning as a rabbinic intern during his studies. Now, he's moving on to his first pulpit position, with a large Conservative congregation near Boston, where he hopes to pursue further graduate work in religious studies.

Rabbi Cohen also goes way back with Kolel. "I grew up at Holy Blossom, and met Elyse when she was the assistant rabbi there," he says.

She considered hiring him when he was first ordained at Hebrew Union College, but there was no second rabbi position at the time. Rabbi Cohen moved to California and married, but became convinced he didn't want to raise his son in L.A. and left North America for an associate rabbi position at Temple Emmanuel in Sydney, Australia.

In Australia and later, with the United Jewish Congregation in Hong Kong, where his duties included travelling around, officiating in unlikely corners of Asia, Rabbi Cohen discovered that, outside of North America, Reform is often the only non-Orthodox option. His congregants represented a wide range of Jewish observance and belief.

Rabbi Goldstein says she's confident his experience with "non-typical Jews" will serve him well at Kolel. Calling himself post-denominationalist, and inclined towards traditional practice, Rabbi Cohen agrees, saying he has "something to offer not only to Reform Jews, but across the spectrum."

He adds that, regardless of his other duties as a rabbi, his greatest interest has always been adult Jewish education. Now divorced, he was also looking for new direction personally after 17 years of congregational life. Kolel doesn't hold regular Shabbat services, and he chuckles, saying, "for the first time in my professional life, I'm going to have to join a synagogue."

Still, he admits there are few better places to shul-shop. "I've lived in New York, L.A... but Toronto is one of the most exciting Jewish communities in North America right now. I've been at the edge of the Diaspora for eight years, and I'm overwhelmed by the wealth of Jewish possibilities here."

Though Rabbi Loevinger, too, has enjoyed Toronto, he admits he won't miss the tendency he's seen within its Jewish community to "breed organizations that have a hard time treating clergy well." Yet he's quick to add that Kolel is an exception, calling it "a wonderful place to work as a rabbi." And he's confident that Rabbi Cohen "will be a part of Kolel's ever-greater success."

Rabbi Cohen, too, is hopeful; this isn't the same town he left two decades ago. "In a sense, I'm coming home," he says, "but I've been away for half my life. The community has changed in great ways." It's clear from his optimism that Rabbi Cohen, in his new role, intends to play an important role in the community's ongoing growth.

Italian Jews feeling 'beleaguered,' says Landy

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A confluence of factors, including the rise to prominence of an extremist right-wing political party, has left the Jewish community of Italy feeling "beleaguered," said Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Italian Jews, who number only 10,000, are concerned about the appointment of Gianfranco Fini, head of Italy's National Alliance (NA), as deputy prime minister in the government of Silvio Berlusconi, Landy said.

Speaking shortly after he returned from a European vacation, Landy said he met with the president of the Italian Jewish community, Amos Luzzatto, in Venice. The two knew each other from a London meeting of Jewish leaders where they were part of a discussion on formulating a Jewish response to the upcoming Durban conference on racism.

Luzzatto told him that Italy's Jews are very concerned over the country's drift to the right, Landy recounted.

Fini has called for stronger government to tackle corruption and to check the power of the Mafia. He has also been quoted as describing his movement – a direct outgrowth of Italy's postwar neo-fascist party – as "post-fascist." He reportedly called fascist dictator Benito Mussolini the greatest Italian in history, although he later claimed he had been quoted out of context.

Fini is part of a group of right-wing political extremists in Europe who have put aside the traditional trappings of fascism for a more moderate image, but the group is still strongly nationalist and anti-immigrant.

Racism in Italy has become acute in recent years, with soccer games proving a lightening rod for extremist agitation. Fans of Lazio, a team in Rome, had developed a notorious reputation for racist behaviour. Two years ago, some fans taunted their intracity Roma rivals by unfurling a banner that read: "Auschwitz is your homeland; The ovens are your homes." A CJN reader said he saw the same banner in a recent telecast of an Italian soccer league match.

Keith Landy

A section of Lazio fans reportedly boo every time Black players in the Italian league touch the ball, and Italian police have identified a connection between soccer fans and extremist acts. In one incident reported in CNN Sports Illustrated, fans of a Roman team were linked to bombs planted at a museum honouring World War II anti-fascist resistance fighters and at a movie theatre screening a film about Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann.

Italian Jews are also upset with the deteriorating relationship with the Roman Catholic Church over the proposal to beatify two popes, Pius IX and Pius XII.

Pius IX served as pope during the 19th century, and under his regime, Jewish boys – including Edgardo Mortara – were abducted and converted to Christianity, Luzzatto said.

The move to beatify Pius XII, who was pope during the Holocaust, is also a bone of contention for Italian Jews. The Italian community is upset over the recent announcement that the Vatican's World War II documents will not be made available to a commission of historians studying Church policy during the Holocaust.

In a preliminary report issued in October 2000, the commission, which includes three Jews and three Roman Catholics, said the documents they had been able to study raised "significant questions" about the pope's and the Vatican's actions during the Holocaust.

Landy said Luzzatto is particularly disappointed in the Church's "intransigence" on the access issue. "There is a perception of a cover-up," he added.

"They feel beleaguered by the situation around them. It's still a Roman Catholic country where the Church carries a lot of weight," said Landy. "We forget that in the aftermath of the Holocaust, with the [reduced] size of the Jewish community, it's difficult for them to carry much weight. They see that their concerns are not being addressed."

Jewish education growth explored

Oliver Valins, one of the report's authors, is not convinced that there is a global trend towards more religious education.

"Mainstream, establishment religions – such as the Church of England and the main [Jewish] Central Orthodox organization in the UK – have undergone decline," Valins said.

Seymour Epstein

At the same time, "other forms of religion and spirituality have seen an increase – evangelical Christianity and haredi Judaism."

Valins believes the growth in Jewish education in England is due to the fact that Jewish schools work, and parents want a good education for their children – preferably without having to pay private school fees.

In England, the government provides 85 percent of the capital costs and 100 percent of the general study teaching expenses in the current (public) system of faith-based education. Parents provide for the religious component of the curriculum.

Another factor in this growth may be that "in England, it is now easier for Jews to be more open about their religion and ethnicity… it's cool to be Jewish," Valins said.

Many parents feel that a Jewish education may also counter the threat of intermarriage, he added.

Paul Shaviv, headmaster of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), pointed out that there are significant differences between England and Canada.

Born and educated in England, Shaviv was director of Immanuel College in England and principal of Bialik High School in Montreal before coming to Toronto.

In North America, the enrolment in full-time Jewish education has more than tripled in the last two decades – from some 60,000 to more than 180,000 students, Shaviv said.

According to the JPR report, 22,640 pupils attended British Jewish day schools in 1999.

Interestingly, 43 percent of the students in full-time Jewish education in England are in haredi schools, while the intensively Orthodox sector only comprises nine percent of the total Jewish community, Shaviv said.

In North America, the rise in Jewish education can be seen in the mainstream Orthodox, Conservative and Reform communities, Shaviv noted.

"In the wider Jewish communities [in North America], sending your child to Jewish day school has become not only acceptable, but even fashionable, in a way unimaginable 30 or more years ago."

Paul Shaviv

CHAT has experienced growth in all parts of the school, which has accelerated over the past three years, Shaviv said.

The new stream, which accepts students who have not previously attended Jewish day schools, has really taken off in the past few years, and now comprises 12 to 15 percent of the school population.

The difference is that "the Jewish community in Britain has never had the same ethnic consciousness that North American communities, particularly Canada, have had," Shaviv said.

"The largest Jewish high school in England does not give anywhere near the level of intensity of Jewish education that high schools in Montreal or Toronto do."

In fact, Shaviv said, "there are some who [have] always regarded the UK Jewish community's attitude to Jewish culture and learning as somewhat philistine."

"Toronto is part of a North American pattern," Epstein said, "[which has seen] an intense interest in Jewish education by the liberal Jewish community."

Part of it may have to do with a disenchantment in the public school system. However, it may also have to do with a search for ethnic identification and community.

"Today, there is an interest in the boutiquing of religion and identities," he said.

"Boutique Judaism reflects the specific needs of a group that forms itself around specific issues. Jewish day schools meet these current community needs," Epstein said.

"For families who send their kids to Jewish day schools, day schools have, to a certain degree, replaced the synagogue as the central Jewish institution of the Jewish family," Shaviv said.

This has profound implications for synagogues and schools, he added.

"Today, schools are radically changing by virtue of the changing school population to meet and reflect the needs of the community.

"And that creates all sorts of questions and challenges in terms of school policy, school identity, curriculum, staffing…

"Jewish educators and leaders have always wanted to see the day when Jewish education was a naturally accepted part of Jewish family life," Shaviv said. "While we're not there yet, we're clearly going in that direction."

Montreal's Wagar High School grads plan reunions

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL – They're coming from the United States, from all parts of Canada and even from Europe. They're coming to reminisce, to see old friends and to reunite with high school classmates.

Wagar High School alumnae are planning reunions for the classes of 1971, 1977, 1981 and 1991.

In an era where technology is moving so quickly that we find ourselves communicating by e-mail rather than picking up the phone or even visiting with friends, reunions can take us back to a slower time, perhaps a nicer time for some.

High school – that time of life when as teenagers we thought we had all the answers. We thought we knew who we were, where we were going and how we were getting there. Surprise, surprise, life does have its twists and turns.

School reunions give us the opportunity to play catch up with friends and classmates we may have left far behind. Perhaps to take a more mature look at who we were then and put some disappointments to rest. Remembering our pasts can help us focus on where we are, remind us of where we came from, and sometimes redirect us as to where we're going. Nostalgia has a way of mellowing us and bringing cohesion and closure.

Wagar High School, part of the English Montreal School Board (EMSB), is located at 5785 Parkhaven Ave. in Cote St. Luc. It was built in 1963 by the then-Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal to serve the English population in the area. It opened with 56 teaching rooms and a capacity for 1,200 pupils, the majority of whom were Jewish.

Its student base now is only 460 pupils in grades 7 to 11, with 26 teachers, but the school continues to offer two streams, English and French immersion with 25 percent of the student body enrolled in the immersion program.

To use the school to its fullest capacity, students from John Grant High School (for students with intellectually disabilities) will be moving into the premises in September.

Michael Cohen, the EMSB communications director, said discussions are ongoing to turn Wagar into a specialty school.

"There already is a media services centre on the first floor," he said, "and the idea is to offer courses in media, film, computer technology, television, radio, etc."

It is hoped that this will give the 38-year-old school a new spark and bring back some of the pride of its history.

In the coming months and into 2002 and beyond, many Wagarites will be remembering their high school years and meeting face to face with their past friends and classmates.

This Labour Day weekend (Sept. 1, 2001), the grads of 1971 will celebrate their 30th anniversary. Alumnae Lynn Smolkin Kauffman (Toronto) and Lawrence Greenspon (Ottawa) have joined forces to organize the reunion for the 396 grads from their year.

"When I realized last summer that it was coming up on 30 years since we graduated high school, I did not want to let this opportunity go by without planning something," Kauffman said.

"Since this has started, I've gotten dozens of e-mails from people all over Canada and the U.S, expressing their excitement about the event. People are coming from all over and the excitement and momentum is mounting exponentially.

Greenspan said that since so many of her former classmates have left Montreal, it was decided to hold the reunion in Toronto.

The 1971 grads – with partners, spouses, dates or solo – are invited to attend the weekend reunion in Toronto and can reserve their space for dinner by e-mailing Smolkin Kauffman at: lynn@cowboycorp.net or Greenspon at: email@1greenspon.com. However, by mid-summer, reservations will be open to non-grads, so don't delay.

A Web site has also been set up for the Wagner Class of '71 reunion at www.wagar-classof71reunion.com

Brenda Levine (Montreal) and Randee Rosenthal Glassman (Toronto), 1981 grads, are hard at work planning the 20th reunion for their 228 classmates. Levine, the manager of ambulatory services at the Royal Victoria Hospital, said they scheduled the reunion for this Sept. 15.

"It's the weekend just before Rosh Hashanah," she said, and the hope is that many alumnae will be coming "home" for the holiday, and will attend with partners or alone.

Plans aren't finalized, but the evening will include a sit down dinner, a DJ and lots of reminiscing. "And one of our teachers, Robert Shuster, has agreed to attend," added Levine.

For further details or to offer assistance, e-mail Levine at: brendalevine@hotmail.com or Rosenthal Glassman at: rsquared@cgocable.net.

The 25th anniversary of the graduating class of 1977 is scheduled for the Victoria Day weekend in May 2002. The organizer for this reunion is Phyllis Frost Shade (Montreal), mother of three, who is also a competitive body builder and personal trainer who teaches kick boxing for adults and elementary school children.

"It will be held at Wagar," said Frost Shade, "and the Victoria Day weekend was chosen so that out-of-towners could attend."

First ministers' conference fallout

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Last week, I promised to write an assessment of the first ministers' conference. I had implied that the conference would produce both fireworks and surprises. I also suggested that the meeting's results might have ramifications for the Jewish community in particular.

Well, the fireworks were called off due to inclement weather – hot air blowing in all directions from every premier. And as for the surprises…well, the only surprise is that your faithful scribe actually believed the pre-conference hype concerning confrontation between the various premiers.

The annual meeting may have been a (now predictable) joke, but it is anything but funny.

Recall that the Atlantic premiers came into the meeting proclaiming that equalization payments – the process through which have-not provinces receive disproportionately larger amounts of federal monies – had to be the top priority of the conference. Ontario Premier Mike Harris reacted by harshly criticizing the Atlantic premiers and used an unfortunate analogy to welfare recipients.

Harris declared that health care was the burning issue of the day and the premiers had to band together to demand that the federal government underwrite 50 percent of the cost of new health-care expenses. "No," chimed in Saskatchewan's first citizen, "it's the drought-stricken farms that need immediate cash handouts."

In response to all of the clamouring, the federal government sent an unequivocal message through Alan Rock, Stephan Dion and Paul Martin: No more money. Period. Instead, improve your management and delivery systems. And so it went for more than a week…until the premiers actually met.

Then, like magic, the premiers hugged and smiled and presented a united and mutually supportive front. Not to be outdone, all of a sudden, the federal government found spare cash (some $240 million!) to deal out to the hungry premiers.

Apart from the cynical messages such behaviour conveys to Canadians, there are some possible consequences for the Jewish community. For example, by not securing the funds for health care he was seeking from Ottawa, Harris may have to look within for funds for the terribly strained health-care sector.

One scenario would see the Tories renege on their private schools promise to ensure sufficient cash flow for any increased health-care costs. A second possible consequence involves home care. If the government cannot increase the provincial capacity to fund home-care programs, the weight of that burden will fall to existing infrastructure, thereby further straining community resources – including those within the Jewish community.

The moral of this tale is that the community must not only insist on some meaningful accountability from its politicians, it must also understand what it is holding the government accountable for.

Jonathon Steinfeld

Bush pilot takes to the skies

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — At 25, Jonathon Steinfeld is one of Canada's youngest chief flying instructors. He may also be Canada's first Jewish bush pilot.

Steinfeld started taking flying lessons in 1992 at the age of 16 while still a student at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate. He earned his flying license in the spring of 1993.

"The irony is that here I was flying to Brandon and back and my parents wouldn't let me drive on the highway," he says.

His parents were supportive of his ambition, he recounts, but the reaction from friends ranged from "neat" to "you're out of your mind."

Although Steinfeld wanted to be a pilot, he wasn't sure initially how to go about it. He attended university, he says, because a degree benefits an aviation career and because it is useful to have a back-up plan in case you are not up to the fitness levels required to be a pilot. He graduated with a degree in education.

About six months before graduation, he learned that the Winnipeg Flying Club was looking for an instructor. He applied and was accepted. After five months of training, he started work at the WFC in June 1997. He has been chief flight instructor for the past two years.

The flying club, which is the largest aviation-training school in Manitoba, is based at St. Andrews Airport just north of Winnipeg. Steinfeld is in charge of an operation that includes 15 aircraft, 12 pilot-instructors and up to 120 students at any given time. He is responsible for the club's safety and for the integrity of the training.

Yet, he says, "The drawback for me is that as chief flying instructor, I don't get as much flying time as I would like."

As with most young flyers, Steinfeld dreams one day of becoming a commercial airline pilot.

"The commercial airlines are the big leagues," he says. "To qualify, you need a lot of hours of flying experience with different types of planes in different environments."

To that end, Steinfeld has become a bush pilot. In addition to his work at the flying club, he has taken a job flying up north for Skyward Aviation, a Manitoba-based charter service which runs regularly scheduled flights to Norway House as well as emergency medical missions to other remote northern Manitoba native communities. The company, Steinfeld says, has 20 aircraft, based in Thompson and Winnipeg, and 60 pilots.

"I have been flying a KingAir 100," he says. "The plane has seats for 12 passengers and two pilots."

The hour-long flights to Norway House go out twice a day, at 7:30 a.m. and 4:15 p.m. Steinfeld once had to get up at 3:30 a.m. to fly a 4:30 charter flight for American hunters.

"It's hard getting into a regular sleeping schedule with those hours," he says. But, he adds, "I like to be challenged. I am just as comfortable flying a two-seater plane as a 14-seater."

Northern Manitoba is beautiful, he says, but some of the communities he has flown to in the north are so poor they look like they are in the Third World.

Steinfeld is hopeful that Skyward will extend his contract beyong the summer through the fall and winter. He is confident that one day he will be behind the controls of a major commercial airliner.

CHAT student involved in premature birth research

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last summer Lior Braunstein began a volunteer stint at Mount Sinai Hospital's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute by doing "menial tasks" and designing a Web site.

It wasn't long, however, before he was given more responsibility. Over the past school year, the 17-year-old Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) student worked as a paid laboratory employee 15 hours per week, the only highschooler there, involved in research on premature birth.

This summer, he is working with a post-doctoral fellow in the same lab, in a position that previously has been available only to third- or fourth-year university students.

What's equally – if not more – impressive, the tall, polite student, who just finished Grade 11, designed and built his own version of a piece of lab equipment that stretches uterine cells taken from rats. The process comprises one step in research that is focused on the causes and prevention of premature birth.

Stretching of the uterine wall is a precondition for labour, explained Braunstein's supervisor, Dr. Stephen Lye, a professor in obstetrics and gynecology and the joint co-director of the University of Toronto's program in development and fetal health.

"We were interested in finding out how the muscle cells know they're being stretched, and how they turn that into signals that cause labour. One of the routes we've been taking is to get cells...and stretch them using this apparatus."

The Braunstein variation of the Flexercell Strain Unit – actually, an attachment to it – has practical implications, shaving as much as 16 hours at a stretch from the time needed to do the research, and costing less than a quarter of the $4,000 (US) retail price. The device has been used in the lab, and Braunstein is currently fine-tuning it.

With the commercially available device, he explained, all four plates are controlled together. With his variation, each can be controlled individually, allowing procedures that take different lengths of time to be done simultaneously instead of consecutively.

"He's done a superb job," said Lye. "It shows that people of all ages can contribute to research."

Braunstein, a sabra who moved here at age 3, has wanted to be a physician since he was 7 or 8 years old, he said. Although he decided as a young teen that he wanted to be a cardiac surgeon, this year's work has gotten him "very interested" in obstetrics and gynecology.

His love of science comes from his father Alfred, a Romanian-born engineer. Braunstein's mother, Dorit, who is also from Romania originally, is a high school science and English teacher.

A top student who skipped Grade 10 math and science, Braunstein writes for his school newspaper and yearbook, has served as captain of the school volleyball team and was voted its most valuable player in Grade 10. He was also on the Toronto Maccabi volleyball team in 1999 and 2000, winning Bronze and then Silver, and serving as team captain in his second year. This year he played on CHAT's volleyball and track and field teams. He also graduated from Grade 8 as valedictorian of Associated Hebrew Schools.

Lior Braunstein [Frances Kraft photo]

Although he placed in the 99th percentile for the Grade 10 Avogadro Chemistry Contest and for its OAC counterpart, the Chem 13 News Exam, he does not spend an inordinate amount of time on homework – maybe 1½ hours a night. "That's why I wanted to stay [at the lab.] I had so much spare time, I was wasting all of it. I wanted to do something productive."

Braunstein, who took an OAC English course in July, often brings his homework to the lab after school, fitting it in while "waiting for something to incubate or cool down."

And although his lab experience doesn't directly relate to his classwork at CHAT, it "helps a lot," he said. "I can't wait to start doing this stuff for an actual degree."

United Way aids Jewish organizations

TORONTO — Last month the United Way of Greater Toronto announced that it distributed a record $60.7 million in last year's campaign, including $6 million in new money, to its 200 funded agencies.

Funding to four Jewish community agencies in 2001 remain unchanged from the year before: The Bathurst Jewish Centre received $384,696; the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living received $143,080; UJA Federation of Greater Toronto received $45,701; and the Bloor Jewish Community Centre's grant for this year was $101,412.

Three other Jewish agencies received an increase in their allocations over the previous year.

Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) received an increase of $151,600, bringing its total grant to $1,517,633.

The extra funds to JF&CS also cover a portion of costs for prevention and support programs for families at risk. Those services include early intervention, parenting programs and family counselling to prevent child abuse, school-based food programs, intensive in-home counselling, and high-level case management of families facing eviction or those living in unstable housing.

Jewish Vocational Services of Greater Toronto received an increase of $30,058 to support increasing costs for programs like psycho-educational and vocational assessment subsidies for low-income individuals and employment services for newcomer groups. The United Way's total grant to JVS was $432,974.

And Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa received a $12,870 increase to enhance its loan recovery program. The United Way's allocation to the agency was $57,580.

Baseball player fights for tolerance in the south

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Ever since he learned to throw a baseball, it was Evan Weinstein's dream to become a professional ball player.

Throughout his childhood, Weinstein chased this dream with a passion. By the time he got to high school, he was so accomplished a pitcher that he was asked to join the senior boys team even though he was only in Grade 9. He played on Team Ontario and won the national championships, was named one of the top 25 greatest high school baseball players in the GTA by the Toronto Star and won the coveted title Athlete of the Year in his graduating year of high school.

Hoping to secure an athletic scholarship to play for a U.S. university, Weinstein pursued coaches, sending them videotapes and references from professional coaches.

"It's tough for Canadian baseball players to get a scholarship," says Weinstein, now 20.

"There aren't as many U.S. coaches willing to come to Canada to watch us play. We don't get a lot of exposure. There's a lot of talent here that never gets in."

Then, when Tusculum College, a small university in rural Tennessee, presented Weinstein with an athletic and academic scholarship and an offer to be one of the team's starting pitchers in his freshman year, he couldn't turn it down.

Though he knew there wouldn't be many Jews there, Weinstein was unprepared for the cold dose of intolerance that awaited him in the American south.

He also never planned to find the courage it would take to defend other minorities victimized by the region's xenophobia.

"Tolerance exists in Toronto because the city is so cosmopolitan. When you live in the south, you start to realize that racism is still very evident. Being Jewish, I was suddenly a minority."

In fact, Weinstein estimates that he was one of only three Jews at Tusculum, a Presbyterian college.

"Some of the people I met at school were brought up to believe that Jews are greedy. Some people even made anti-Semitic remarks to me," he continues.

"I was the first Jew many had ever met. I looked 'normal' but I was supposedly 'Jewish.'"

Weinstein says that most of the people he has met are accepting of him and respect him as a person, an athlete, a top student and vice-president of student government. When Jewish holidays arrive, Weinstein says his friends are curious and ask him questions about his religion. Even his professors take note of his minority status and have made an effort to to be understanding.

"My religion professor made me comfortable," Weinstein says. "Religion was a mandatory class, and for a major paper, we had to write about a [Christian] prophetic voice. He let me write about Golda Meir and the Zionist movement, and I did really well on it."

Nonetheless, his experience as a minority enables him to sympathize with other minorities.

"I can sympathize with Blacks and gays because there is no tolerance [for them in the south]."

Weinstein's newfound ability to sympathize led him to literally fight to defend a victim of discrimination. He relays the story of how one day he saw the only openly gay student in school visibly distraught because one of the athletes harassed him incessantly. In the past, the bully had also directed anti-Semitic comments towards Weinstein.

Enraged upon hearing the student's story, Weinstein says he confronted the bully and knocked him to the floor, extracting a promise from him to leave other minorities alone.

Though Weinstein does not condone violence, he says, "I can sympathize with [minorities]. At school I am also one, but at the same time, I was in a position of power because I'm an athlete and well respected among my peers. I just did what anyone in my position would have done."

Weinstein says that the campus minister as well as some of his professors applauded him for having the courage to defend an openly gay student in a region that he says "greatly frowns upon homosexuality."

Despite such recognition and acceptance, Weinstein admits that he gets lonely being one of the only Jews in a Christian college, and says that it was hard to adapt initially.

"The first month of my freshman year I went through a culture shock. I was set on leaving. It was so different, and I wasn't around any Jews, but I got used to it. You just have to look for the positives."

Evan Weinstein found the courage to defend other minorities. [Erin Silver photo]

He's now abandoned his dream of becoming a professional baseball player, saying, "I've got other aspirations now," and instead wants to pursue a career in corporate finance. He's going into his third year at Tusculum and is working towards a double major in business and accounting and a minor in math.

Overall, Weinstein says that attending a school in the south is a good learning experience.

"I learned a lot about racism and ignorance. Being exposed to it makes you appreciate the tolerance that exists in Toronto."

Tech school to be named for Montrealer

MONTREAL — A technical school in Israel will be named in memory of the late David Shock, a lay interpreter of chazzanut for many years.

Shock, who died in 1997 at age 90, left most of his estate to the Amal network of colleges and high schools. He was a loyal contributor for many years to the Histradrut campaign, with which Amal was formerly affiliated. The Canadian Friends of Amal, with the estate's executors, have selected the Amal Beit Shemesh Technological School as an appropriate memorial to him.

"Beit Shemesh is one of the poor areas in Israel with a traditionally religious population," said the Canadian Friends' executive director Michael Meyer.

"About 40 percent of the students attending the Amal school there come from that background," he said.

"The headmaster has for some time wished to open a religious centre where the students in his secular school would be able to learn about Judaism, Jewish history and tradition, as well as Zionism," Meyer said.

The bequest will enable one of the buildings to be refurbished to house such a centre, and the centre will be named after Shock.

Born in Warsaw, the son of a cantor, Shock immigrated to Canada as a young man in 1926. He later sponsored his widowed mother, and was her sole supporter for the rest of her life. Shock, who never married, worked in the ladies' garment industry as a designer and later established his own business with a partner.

He is remembered as "a very unassuming person who didn't want to be a burden to anybody and always shunned centre stage," said Allan Korzinstone, one of the executors.

The Montreal Council of Chazzanim produced a posthumous recording of his interpretations, which represents only a selection of the many tapes he made of traditional Jewish music.

Shock was buried in Israel.

The symbolism of challah

By RUTH HEIGES
(IPS)

The culinary traditions of the High Holy Days are laden with symbolism and puns. Some, such as apple dipped in honey and round challot are widely known, others quite obscure.

"From the time of the Talmud, a fanciful combination of word play, visual association and flavours designated a whole series of foods as totems for the year to come," wrote Ruth Abusch-Magder in her 1998 doctoral dissertation on domestic Jewish culture.

"The head of a sheep or fish, like the round challah, was traditionally eaten because of its physical form. It symbolizes our desire to come out 'ahead.'"

Of all these traditions, the most widely observed is that of the round challah, whose form speaks volumes. It may even be the closest to a universally practised tradition among Jews of all origins.

What's more, the round challah is the true form of the original round showbread loaves that were kept on the Temple altar – 12 flat loaves, one for each of the tribes, in two stacks. It wasn't until the 15th century that challot were made in any other shape.

"Then many German Jews adopted a new form of Sabbath bread, an oval, braided loaf modelled on popular Teutonic bread," writes Gil Marks in The World of Jewish Cooking. "In some places, the Sabbath bread took on the biblical name challah. Eventually, this braided loaf... made its way eastward, becoming the most prevalent form of Sabbath bread among eastern Europeans."

While the style may have been adopted for its beauty, some justified this borrowing on the basis that braiding or twisting was a pun on twisting off the little piece of first dough as a reminder of the Temple sacrifices.

Impelled by the concept of hiddur mitzvah – enhancing and elevating the mitzvah – "the braided challah loaf was further embellished, the shape and appearance usually reflecting Jewish legend and lore, most notably the biblical manna," Marks writes.

These additions included eggs and saffron to emulate the yellow colour of manna, sweeteners symbolic of its taste, and seeds "sprinkled over the dough, as the manna fell in the form of coriander seeds."

A crown shape is a classic for Rosh Hashanah, alluding to God as the King of Kings. A challah in the shape of a ladder or a round one with a ladder on top serves as a reminder during the pre-fast Yom Kippur meal that God decides who will ascend and descend the ladder of life.

The advent of automatic bread makers (ABMs) has awakened many to the fundamental satisfaction of baking their own bread, often resulting in the creation of unusual shapes.

To preserve her family recipes for her children, Elaine Radis of Framingham, Mass., created an electronic family cookbook for her children and grandchildren.

She includes an ABM challah recipe that has become the year-round family standard. "After the kneading phase ends in the machine, either form the dough into the classic 'turban' spiral or make balls the size of tennis balls and put them into a round cake pan. Then I make ping pong-sized balls and a smaller one for the middle," she explains.

"I put the big ones on the bottom and the smaller ones on top, but further in from the edge." The result is a dramatic crown of bread that pulls apart into individual portions.

The turban shape is the one preferred by Moishe Perlmutar, a professional baker who learned the techniques from his father who came from the Ukraine and opened a bakery in Toronto in 1911. "I believe that the shape follows the pathway to heaven," he says.

Indeed, the spiral is an important motif in spiritual studies, including Kabbalah. How fitting that it should be implemented in the Rosh Hashanah challah!

"I form it by making one length... of hand-rolled sweet challah dough, sometimes with raisins," Perlmutar explains.

"I hold one end in place and wind the rest of the [length] around, pressing the end so that it doesn't unravel."

Raisins are a classic addition to challah dough, but almost any dried fruit can be used. One Sephardi tradition is to add anise seeds to the dough. If using the ball technique, one can stick a date into each ball for good luck.

ELAINE'S BREAD MACHINE CHALLAH

Bread:
1 package yeast
3 cups flour
4 tbsp. sugar
2 eggs
6 tbsp. vegetable oil
1½ tsp. salt
¾ cup warm water

Combine all ingredients in the pan in the order listed, select "white bread" and follow the directions for your machine. You can bake the bread in your machine or follow the directions below.

Remove dough from the bread maker after the manual mode stops, (second rise); and then braid and rise again; then put an egg wash over the challah.

Egg Wash: One egg beaten with an equal amount of water. Brush on liberally before baking and then once during the bake. This gives the challah a hard and shiny crust. You can sprinkle on seeds of your choice (sesame or poppy) after the first "wash."

Bake at 350 until a light toasty brown.

SWEET ROUND RAISIN CHALLAH

This recipe by Montreal baker Marcy Goldman, which appears in her book Jewish Holiday Baking (Doubleday, 1998), reflects the baker's contribution to hiddur mitzvah by enriching the dough with extra eggs.

Bread:
1½ cups dark or yellow raisins, plumped
1¾ cups warm water
2 tbsp. yeast
pinch sugar
⅓ cup sugar
⅓ cup light honey
3½ tsp. salt
½ cup oil
3 eggs
2 egg yolks
6 to 7 cups bread flour

Egg wash:
2 tbsp. water
2 tsp. sugar
1 egg
1 yolk

In a large mixing bowl stir together the yeast, water and pinch of sugar. Let stand for five minutes to allow yeast to swell. Briskly stir in remaining sugar, honey and salt. Then add oil, eggs, yolks and about five cups of the flour. Stir briefly and let stand 10-20 minutes to absorb flour. Knead, by hand or with a dough hook, adding remaining flour as required to make soft and elastic dough (about 10-12 minutes).

Dough should leave sides of the bowl. If it is sticky, add small amounts of flour until dough is soft but no longer sticks. (Note: if you find dough too bulky for your mixer, divide in two. Knead one portion at a time).

Let dough rest on a lightly floured board for 10 minutes, then flatten and press in raisins as evenly as possible, folding dough over raisins. Place dough in a greased bowl and cover with greased plastic wrap and a damp tea towel or with a damp tea towel and place entire bowl inside a large plastic bag. Let rise in a draft-free place until doubled and puffy looking – from 45 to 90 minutes.

(If you are doing an overnight, cool rise, place dough in a large, lightly greased bowl and insert this into a large plastic bag. Refrigerate overnight. If you see the bread rising too quickly, open the bag, deflate dough and reseal. Next day, allow dough to warm up then gently deflate and proceed.)

Divide dough in two. For a turban-shaped New Year's challah, shape each section into a long rope (about 12-14 in. long) which is thicker at one end, and coil it, starting with the thicker end and tucking the end in on top. You can also divide each dough section into three ropes, around 14 inches long, and make a traditional challah braid.

Place on a cornmeal dusted baking sheet. In a small bowl, whisk together egg glaze ingredients. Brush loaf with egg wash and sprinkle with sesame seeds. Let rise until puffy – around 20-30 minutes. Preheat oven to 400. Bake bread for 12 minutes then reduce heat to 350 and bake another 25 minutes or until bread is evenly browned.

Makes one large or two medium loaves. Can be frozen baked or unbaked. If freezing unbaked, let bread rise slowly, overnight in the fridge. Bring to room temperature before baking.

Upcoming U.S. strategic dialogue a boost for Sharon

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — At the end of August, Ariel Sharon's government will send a team of senior officials to Washington for a first round of "strategic dialogue" talks with the Americans.

For Prime Minister Sharon, this will mark a significant achievement in relations with the U.S. administration. It is clear that despite the continuing conflict with the Palestinians, the United States remains interested in co-operating with Israel in formulating regional policy.

The meeting illustrates the unique status of Israel in Washington. The U.S. administration has no similar forum for policy and security exchanges with the Palestinian Authority – nor indeed with any of the moderate Arab states that are close friends of Washington, such as Egypt or Saudi Arabia.

The convening of this forum, on August 27, will also express an upgrading in the level of strategic dialogue between the United States and Israel. Heading the U.S. team will be the Under Secretary of State, Richard Armitage. In previous meetings, a lower level official headed the American teams – usually an assistant secretary of state for Middle East affairs.

The agenda of the strategic talks will reflect the new emphasis of the Bush and Sharon governments in Middle Eastern diplomacy – the "peace process" is not on the agenda; instead, the two sides will discuss "regional stability."

Palestinian terrorism and the PA will be central in the talks, and the Israeli delegation will exchange assessments with its hosts regarding PA President Yasser Arafat.

Presumably the two sides will focus on the implications of the Israeli-Palestinian confrontation for the general stability of the Middle East and American efforts to isolate Iraq further – and possibly topple Saddam Hussein.

Other issues expected to be discussed have already been raised in earlier meetings: "preserving the qualitative edge" of the Israel Defence Forces and the Israeli Defence Ministry's hardware requirements and the military assistance needed from the Americans.

They will also exchange intelligence information and discuss the development of nuclear weapons and ballistic missiles in Iran, focusing on ways of blocking the flow of Russian technology to Iran. Attention will be given to international conventions on arms control and on the U.S. plans for the development of a ballistic missile shield, which was at the crux of recent Washington-Moscow exchanges.

The decision to hold these talks was made during Sharon's first visit to Washington as prime minister in March. Sharon requested that the level of the dialogue be upgraded and that focus be directed at the regional issues, but did not present the Americans with a "shopping list" or proposals for new agreements.

In charge of setting up the meetings was the Israeli ambassador in Washington, David Ivry, who had been involved for a number of years in the joint strategic talks between the two sides. In Israel, the preparations are being handled by the national security adviser, Major General Uzi Dayan.

The new strategic forum has been built on the ruins of previous committees, which operated during the Netanyahu and Barak governments. Strategic talks with the United States have been going on since 1983, and have been handled by the Defence and Foreign Ministries. In recent years, Israeli prime ministers have tried to bring the talks under their direct authority, in an effort to give the dialogue greater diplomatic weight rather than a purely security focus.

The first such committee was set up toward the end of Benjamin Netanyahu's term in office. In exchange for the signing of the Wye accords, in 1998, the Clinton administration issued a memorandum of understanding stating that a Joint Strategic Planning Committee would be set up between Israel and the United States. The dialogue focused mostly on the threats posed by Iran and Iraq.

The forum was dispersed after only two meetings because of the 1999 elections in Israel. When Ehud Barak took over as prime minister, he wanted to expand the mechanism to involve the United States as an active element in overall peace agreements with the Syrians and the Palestinians.

Barak pursued a "defensive alliance lite" with the Americans, and sought a huge advanced weapons technology package in exchange for his planned pullback from the Golan Heights.

This time, it is expectations from the forum that are "lite." No one is talking about peace agreements, or defence pacts. The main consideration of the Bush and Sharon administrations is how to weather the current regional crisis with minimum damage.

Controversial saint invoked in papal call for Mideast peace

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — In his latest call for peace in the Middle East, Pope John Paul II has invoked the name of Edith Stein, a Jewish convert to Catholicism who became a nun, was killed during the Holocaust, and was later made a saint.

Stein, canonized in 1998 as St. Teresa Benedetta della Croce, "died, along with her sister Rosa and many others of her people, in the gas chambers of Auschwitz-Birkenau on Aug. 9, 1942," the pope told the faithful gathered at his summer residence outside Rome.

"We are seeing the life and dignity of human beings trodden upon in a violent manner right in the Holy Land, to which St. Teresa Benedetta had a deep spiritual link," the pope added Sunday.

The pope prayed for the intercession of St. Teresa Benedetta so that "the political and military authorities in the conflicting sides will not lack good will, that they will bear in mind before God and history the urgency of silencing their arms, and that they reflect on the future of their peoples – a future that cannot be of hate, but of brotherhood, not of confrontation but of collaboration."

Bemoaning the outbreak of "unheard-of brutality," he also admitted that his earlier pleas for peace have gone unheeded.

In declaring Stein a saint in 1998, the pope attempted to use her figure as a means of paying homage to Holocaust victims and promoting Christian-Jewish dialogue.

At the time, he called Stein both "an eminent daughter of Israel and a faithful daughter of the Church" and used the canonization to appeal for tolerance, dialogue and reconciliation.

He said Stein's saint's day each year – Aug. 9, the anniversary of her death – would be celebrated as a Holocaust memorial, to remind the world "of that bestial plan to eliminate a people, which cost millions of Jewish brothers and sisters their lives."

Honouring Stein in this way, however, affronted some Jewish sensibilities.

Many Jews said that by making a Jewish convert to Catholicism a saint, the pope had offended the memory of the Holocaust's Jewish victims.

Compensation funds confuse Jews

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — Thousands of former Nazi-era slave and forced labourers have begun to receive payments from Austrian and German compensation funds, but some Jewish survivors may have to wait a bit longer for their money because of confusion over which fund will pay them.

Payments totaling about $36 million (US) began to go out two weeks ago to some 20,000 former slave and forced labourers – most of them non-Jews – from an approximately $400 million fund created by the Austrian government and Austrian industry.

But Jews who survived slave labour in concentration camps in Austria are not eligible for monies from the Austrian fund, and must apply instead to the $4.7 billion German compensation fund, which began making payments this week.

This has led to some confusion among survivors, according to Erika Jakubovits, executive director of the presidium of the Jewish Community of Austria.

"When it comes to people who have been in concentration camps, Germany is responsible for payment," Jakubovits says. "We are not very happy, because people think they have to apply here and then their papers are sent to Germany."

Claims forwarded to Germany involve survivors of such concentration camps as Mauthausen and satellite camps of Dachau, which were located on Austrian soil.

"It's like hitting your head against a wall," says Bernard Mueller, who has been working for 20 years to receive compensation for his slave labour.

An additional complication are the funds' different deadlines for applicants.

The Austrian deadline is Nov. 27, 2002.

The German deadline was to expire in August, but the German compensation foundation is planning to extend this to the end of this year, according to Karen Heilig, director of international relations for the New York-based Claims Conference.

Under the terms of an agreement reached in March 2000, some 240,000 slave labourers – about 140,000 of whom are Jewish – would receive up to $7,500 each from the German fund. More than 1 million forced labourers – mostly non-Jews – would get up to $2,500 each.

Of the estimated 150,000 survivors eligible for payments from Austria, fewer than 10,000 are Jewish, says Heilig.

"The main Jewish beneficiaries" are Hungarian Jews "brought over by the Germans to build fortifications when the Germans were retreating in 1944," she says.

About 6,000 live in Hungary and the rest live in Israel, the United States, France, Australia and other countries.

Their payments will be administered by the Foundation for Jewish Heritage in Hungary.

The final obstacle to the payments from the Austrian fund was removed July 31, when Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schussel formally released the funds after U.S. Judge Shirley Wohl Kram dismissed the last class-action suits against Austria.

Gideon Taylor, executive vice president of the Claims Conference, said he is pleased that "the payments are starting, even though most of them will be for non-Jews."

The first 1,200 payments from the Austrian fund were made two weeks ago. A further 5,000 transfers were expected to be made last week to individuals in about 20 countries worldwide, and to three organizations responsible for disseminating the moneys to survivors in Poland, the Czech Republic and the Ukraine.

In all, only 44 people are slated to receive the highest compensation level of about $7,000. These are people who were forced to work in Austrian facilities similar to concentration camps.

Most of the Austrian cases involve agricultural workers.

Some 10,000 people in this category will receive $1,300 each. Nearly 9,000 former industrial workers will receive $2,300 each. Twenty eight battered women and people who suffered through medical experiments will receive $350.

House ordered closed in June

Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said even though the Orient House closure had drawn international criticism, it had been productive in making Arafat understand that he will pay a price for continuing terrorism. The proof of the move's effectiveness, he said, is that Arafat has already begun arresting terrorists, though not to the extent that Israel would like.

But other Labour ministers were sharply critical of the decision. Foreign Minister Shimon Peres warned that it was likely to lead to international isolation. In Northern Ireland, he said, all sides are still talking despite bombing attacks, and Israeli-Palestinian dialogue should be similarly maintained.

Peres was most upset, however, by the fact that the decision was not brought up for a revote in the cabinet last week. Circumstances have changed since the Dolphinarium bombing, he argued.

Sharon responded that he decided against another cabinet discussion of the issue because of the need to act with immediacy and surprise.

Orient House, in East Jerusalem, was ordered closed down after the bombing at the Dolphinarium.

Terror attacks

CARNAGE IN JERUSALEM: A suicide bombing rocked central Jerusalem at lunch time on August 9, killing 16 people including children. The attack took place in the packed Sbarro pizza restaurant at the corner of King George and Jaffa Streets. The building was demolished.

Islamic Jihad takes credit for Haifa bomb

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Islamic Jihad has claimed responsibility for the suicide attack this past Sunday on the patio of a restaurant in Kiryat Motzkin, a northern suburb of Haifa, which killed the bomber and injured 21 Israelis, most of them lightly.

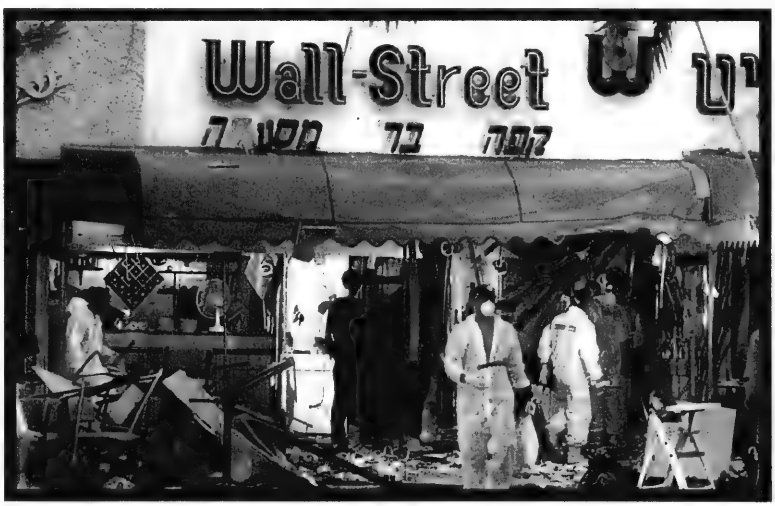
The attack followed the lethal bombing of a crowded Jerusalem pizzeria last Thursday that killed 14 and left scores injured.

The terrorist was carrying the bomb in a bag and struck at 5:25 p.m. at the Wall Street restaurant on the main street of the coastal, working class suburb. Eyewitnesses said he ran into the restaurant, yelled "Allahu Akbar" (God is Great), and lit a fuse to a bomb he was carrying in a plastic bag.

Café owner Aharon Roseman said he saw the bomber approach him looking very agitated. He turned to a waitress and asked her: "Do you know what I have here?"

"He then lit the fuse that was strapped to his neck. I grabbed a chair and threw it at him, and ran behind a wall, and that's what saved me."

A taxi driver told investigators he had driven the bomber to the site of the explosion.



Workers search through the rubble outside the restaurant in Kiryat Motzkin near Haifa. Israel decided not to respond immediately to the attack which happened last Sunday. [Israel photo]

Explosives experts said the workmanship of the explosive device was poor and therefore not sufficiently powerful to cause any fatalities. The injuries were relatively minor also because the bomber exploded the device near the open doors of the restaurant, expanding the radius over which the shrapnel was flung but limiting the power of the blast.

"The terrorist blew himself up inside the restaurant... we know that he came to Israel from the territories close to us [the northern West Bank]," the head of the police northern district, Yaakov Borovsky, said on Sunday. "As far as we know, the suicide bomber was not linked to other incidents in the north and it is still not clear how long he was inside Israel."

The mayor of the suburb, Haim Tzuri, said, "Kiryat Motzkin is a small place and this attack was a great surprise and shock to us all, and I think that the attack on the town of Kiryat Motzkin has turned into all other places in the country, a country at war."

The police chief stressed that there were no specific warnings of a pending attack. He also emphasized that "preparations against terrorism does not necessarily begin at the Green Line but starts and ends with combined IDF and intelligence operations on one side of the Green Line and by police operations on the Green Line. We must reinforce these forces and expand their activities in order to limit to a minimum possible the attacks."

The Al-Manar television station of the Lebanese Islamic organization, the Hezbollah, announced in a news bulletin that the name of the suicide bomber is Muhammad Mahmud Maher Nasser, a 28-year-old member of the Islamic Jihad from the village of Kabatiyah, south of Jenin in the West Bank.

Nasser had worked for the Palestinian security forces until he left six weeks ago. "Since then, he said often that he wanted to become a martyr," his father Mahmoud said at the family home.

"Our fighter was able to penetrate into the heart of Zionism with all the security measures," said Islamic Jihad leader Sheikh Abdullah Shami. "We will continue our fight, our struggle, our operations until we reach our goal of complete freedom."

The Israeli decision not to respond immediately to Sunday's terrorist attack stems from a number of reasons. Primarily, the IDF assessed that the Palestinian security officers have already vacated their positions in the Jenin area, as has become the standard operating procedure immediately following any terrorist attacks inside Israel.

Another reason is the relatively limited number of injuries caused by the blast.

Israeli security sources assess that the attack was organized by the Islamic Jihad cells in the Jenin area, under the leadership of Nursi Tuwalbeh and Thabeth Mardawi. This same group was responsible for two other suicide bomb attacks in Hadera and Binyamin, and several other attacks that were prevented, including those in Haifa, Afula and Beit Shan.

U.S. Jews seek to revoke Arafat's Nobel Prize

By MICHELLE DARDASHTI
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Frustrated by what they consider Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's renewed embrace of violence, a group of young American Jewish professionals has launched an Internet petition to revoke Arafat's Nobel Peace Prize.

Located on the Web at www.revoketheprize.org, the petition asks "all people of morality and good faith to stand up and express their anger and disappointment in Mr. Arafat by calling for the revocation of his Nobel Peace Prize."

One of the organizers, Mark Semer, said the petition, which has been up since the end of June, has almost 10,000 signatures.

"We believe that the peace prize gives Arafat legitimacy as a peacemaker that he does not deserve," Semer says, adding that the site is not affiliated with any political organization or religious denomination.

The desire to strip Arafat of his Nobel was born almost as soon as he received it.

Together with former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, Arafat received the prize in December 1994, a year after he agreed to renounce decades of violent opposition to the State of Israel and resolve Israeli-Palestinian differences peacefully.

The decision to reward Arafat was harshly criticized in the Jewish community and beyond. One member of the Nobel prize committee even resigned in protest.

Americans for Peace Now was one of the few groups in the Jewish world to back Arafat's prize in 1994.

Lewis Roth, the group's assistant executive director, called the new petition – and similar attempts to discredit Arafat since the Palestinian uprising began last September – "unproductive."

"Problematic though he is, he is still the only [way] that Israel has to pursue negotiations," Roth says.

But one long-standing Arafat critic, Zionist Organization of America President Morton Klein, backs the drive.

"It is a perpetual stain on the Nobel Peace Prize until he is removed from the list of peace prize winners," Klein says.

It's not clear what practical effect the petition could have.

Semer, a New York public relations consultant, is hopeful that the Nobel Commission will be compelled at least to consider the proposal if the petition reaches a "critical mass."

Arafat is not the only one of the 1994 winners to come in for criticism.

Last spring, shortly after Labour party leader Peres agreed to serve as foreign minister in Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's unity government, an Israeli Arab lawmaker said his Nobel should be revoked.

Semer maintains that his primary goal is peace, but his current concern is the welfare of the Jewish people.

"Right now there's a great deal of pain and suffering in Israel," Semer says. The petition "is something that, as American Jews, we believe is a constructive effort in support of the State."

Seymour Mayne's best poems 'dictated by angels'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With 24 volumes of critically-acclaimed poetry behind him, Seymour Mayne can relax and bask in the glory.

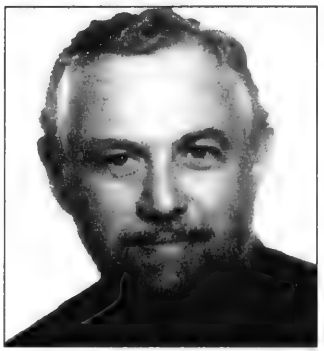
Yet Mayne, 57, has no intention of slowing down, not when his creative juices are flowing.

"I'm still going strong, and with God's help, I'll continue," said Mayne.

An observant Jew and ardent Zionist whose work is distinguished by vibrancy, energy, warmth and humour, he is addicted to his craft.

"You know you have to do it. You don't feel in balance unless you're writing."

Mayne, whose latest books are Carbon Filter and Light Industry, both published by Mosaic Press, believes that a successful poet must be open and impressionable to life's experiences and be able to continually grow.



Seymour Mayne

"You have to develop the art of kicking yourself in the pants," explained Mayne, a professor of English at the University of Ottawa. "Otherwise, you become complacent."

Although he sometimes sits down with the deliberate aim of composing a poem, his muse is usually spontaneous inspiration. "The best poems," he said, "come unbidden, dictated by angels."

No elitist, Mayne is of the opinion that poetry, like bread, is for everyone. "It should be available to any literate and intelligent person. It's not just for critics and professors."

Mayne, who doubles as an editor and translator, turned to poetry just before his bar mitzvah. It was a means by which to deal with his demons and budding views of the world.

As he put it: "Teenagehood is full of ups and downs and challenges. It's a time when you're emotionally high-keyed, less inhibited and society hasn't yet imposed its controls on you."

Mayne's first poem, rooted in social protest, was inspired by his reading of Jeremiah. His second, emerging from the same tradition, was on the detrimental effects of suburbanization.

Since then, he has composed about 10,000 poems, of which 1,000 have been published in books ranging from Mouth (1970) and Diasporas (1977) to Children of Abel (1986) and City of the Hidden (1998).

Much of his poetry is suffused by a Jewish sensibility and an attachment to Israel.

The scion of Yiddish-speaking East European immigrants, he grew up in Montreal's Cartier neighbourhood, memorialized by the late Mordecai Richler. His father, Henry, was a draftsman. His mother, Doris, ran the household.

He and his brother, Aharon, now a

Poet's work is suffused by an attachment to Israel

Canadian diplomat, are products of the Jewish day school system. After studying at McGill University, Mayne earned MA and PhD degrees from the University of British Columbia in English literature.

He returns to Israel as often as possible, invariably as a visiting academic or guest lecturer, and spends the bulk of his time in Jerusalem, a city he adores.

Four of his collections of poetry, including Vanguard of Dreams and Simple Ceremony, have been translated into Hebrew, a record few poets can match.

Although he once seriously considered making aliyah, Mayne has not taken the plunge. "I don't want to commit economic suicide," said Mayne. "I don't have the economic means to survive there, but I belong in Israel."

Mayne, who follows Israeli current events closely, describes himself as a "pessimistic optimist" when it comes to peace in the Middle East.

"I wanted to believe that the Oslo process marked the beginning of the end of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians. But deep inside, I thought it wouldn't work. I'm not surprised the process collapsed. It may take two, three generations for things to work out."

A lay chaplain at the University of Ottawa, he wrote his doctorate thesis on Montreal's Jewish poets, the first dissertation of its kind.

As a scholar, he has delved into this topic regularly, having edited studies of A.M. Klein, Irving Layton and other such poets.

"Klein was one of the first poets I read. He taught me I could write about my own experiences. I loved his intoxication with language."

Klein, he added, is a poet whose reputation grows year by year. "He was the first English writer to interpret Quebec to Canada, and one of the first major Anglo-Jewish poets to write about his experiences in English."

Mayne, whose foray into literature eclipsed his ambition to be a rabbi, has used his knowledge of Yiddish to translate four volumes of Yiddish poetry into English.

He also has written a number of short stories, some under a pseudonym. "Most are light and humourous, with a serious sub-text about the challenge of cultural transmission."

In 1992, he and Shel Krakofsky established Parchment, an annual journal of contemporary Jewish writing in Canada.

"It has helped give Jewish Canadian writers a sense of community, and served as a forum for a lot of younger Jewish writers."

ISRAELI SINGER MAKES CANADIAN DEBUT AT TORONTO SYNAGOGUE

Mizrachi of Canada is sponsoring a summer heat wave concert featuring Chaim Dovid Saracik, the Jewish musician who has packed houses in Israel and the United States. The engagement is his Canadian premiere.

The South African native is a former yeshiva bocher who met and was greatly influenced by Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, at whose suggestion Chaim Dovid moved to Israel some 25 years ago. He rose to prominence with his first solo album, Or Chadash, in 1986.

It's said that Chaim Dovid generates the same kind of electricity on stage that was typically associated with his mentor, Rabbi Carlebach. A portion of the proceeds from the concert has been earmarked for special projects in Yeshivot Hesder and the Israel Solidarity Fund.

Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue. Wednesday, Aug. 15, 7:30 p.m. $36 in advance and at the door. 416-630-9266.

Sister Kay: The National Film Board of Canada recently released a video profile of Sister Kay, the Saskatchewan-born nun who rose to the most powerful position available to a woman in the Catholic Church. Sister Kay helped to usher in many changes in the church, and concentrated especially on healing the painful past between Catholics and Jews.

The leader of the Sisters of Sion in Canada, Sister Kay challenged long-held church attitudes towards Jews, and fought for the eradication of "all hatred, persecution, and display of anti-Semitism leveled at any time from any source against the Jews."

The 48-minute NFB video may be ordered by phoning 800-267-7710.

Klezmer in Ukraine: Thanks to two well-known klezmer and Yiddish music specialists from America and a third from England, the torch of klezmer is being passed to a new generation of musicians in Eastern Europe and countries of the former Soviet bloc.

Zalmen Mlotek, Adrienne Cooper and Merlin Shepherd are the headliners of KlezFest in Ukraine, which gives 39 musicians and singers from the region the opportunity to hone their klezmer skills.

A project of the Jewish Community Development Fund of Russia and Ukraine, the klezmer festival provides master classes, musical theory and traditional klezmer jam sessions.

It runs Aug. 28 to Sept. 2 at Planeta Hotel in Evpatoria, Ukraine. For details, contact Yana Yanover at center@cjeu.carrier.kiev.ua or Martin Horwitz at jcdf@ajws.org.

Singer Tsepora believes Yiddish music is 'incredible'

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

When mezzo-soprano Faye Sidorsky – known to the music industry and her fans by her Hebrew name Tsepora – went to a psychic and was told that there are important beings up there who believe she has a purpose in life, Sidorsky says she wasn't at all surprised.

Everything in her life, from her Hebrew name, which means songbird, to the fact that she and not her sister attended Hebrew school, led her to believe she has a mission to fulfill.

"I'm on a mission to educate people and have them hear Jewish music."

Not only does she believe that Yiddish music is "incredible," but Sidorsky, who is in her late 20s, says it is also important because some of it hasn't been performed in 100 years.

Her first professional CD, titled Timeless Journey Through Jewish Song, "allows people to remember the songs their grandparents sang to them, and it also exposes others to new music."

Sidorsky's mission began a few years ago when she went to a public library to look for Jewish music for a friend's wedding.

"Some of it was really old, some of it was bad. I began to wonder what it would sound like if I sang these songs."

Trained as a classical singer, she has performed with the Calgary Philharmonic Orchestra, the Calgary Opera and even did background vocals for an animated film.

Sidorsky says, however, she feels more of a connection to Jewish music.

After performing the High Holy Day cantorial service last year at Calgary's Temple B'nai Tikvah, Sidorsky says she could not go back to the opera world.

"I wanted to help create a resurgence of this beautiful music," she says, noting that Jewish music is not very prevalent in most American cities, Western Canada, or more specifically, Calgary, where she was born and raised.

To this end, she says that she has tried to inject new life into these old melodies. "I tried to make these songs sound the way people want to hear them. It's important that the music be accessible."

Sidorsky says she would like to travel to every North American city and to eastern Europe to make this music accessible to a wide audience.

Though expensive, she has computerized background orchestra music so she can perform small concerts and travel as much as she wants without having to depend on a live orchestra.

Though Sidorsky has given many concerts, she still has memories of her debut performance. "I came home from Hebrew school one day and wanted to be in the talent show. The show was only for Grade 7 students and I was only in Grade 1. After my teacher spoke to my mother, they let me perform. I remember enjoying being up there."

Then, when she was 12, Sidorsky says the cantor who gave her bat mitzvah lessons took her under his wing after recognizing her talent.

Sidorsky began classical training two years later. When she was about 17, Sidorsky says she performed a piece for the opera competition at the Kiwanis Music Festival and won.

"I was so surprised that I won because I competed against older, more experienced singers."

After studying opera privately she was hired to sing for the the orchestra in Calgary.

"So many things in my life came together to have led me to this point. It was really meant to be," she says, pausing to explain how excited and emotional she becomes when discussing her passion for Jewish music.

"The first time I sang on the bimah, I felt this spiritual connection. It felt like God was saying, 'I gave you this voice, now share it.' I never want to take it for granted."

Story behind Night of the Murdered Poets detailed in two new books

13 Jews executed by Stalin's assassins on Aug. 12, 1952

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Solomon Mikhoels, the director of the Moscow State Yiddish Theatre, was summoned to Minsk in January 1948 on the direct orders of Joseph Stalin, the dictatorial leader of the Soviet Union.

Once in Minsk, Mikhoels was taken to a country house, then murdered by the Belorussian security services. Mikhoels' body was dumped in the snow on a quiet street in Minsk, and his death was cynically registered as a traffic accident. Subsequently, in grand mafioso style, he was given a state funeral.

Mikhoels' ghastly demise was the opening shot of Stalin's assault on two carefully-chosen targets: the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee (JAC), which Mikhoels had chaired, and Soviet Yiddish culture.

The campaign culminated on Aug. 12, 1952 with the execution of 13 Soviet Jews, including five prominent Yiddish writers and poets, who had been active in JAC's activities. The executions, following a lengthy secret trial, are known today as The Night of the Murdered Poets.

Stalin established JAC in 1942 to rally Western support for the Soviet Union during the darkest days of World War II. Ten years later, in a dramatic volte face, JAC was excoriated as an anti-Soviet institution and its leading members were accused of being part of a so-called Zionist and American plot against the Soviet Union.

In 1994, three years after the collapse of the Soviet Union, the transcripts of the trial were published in Moscow.

Now, in Stalin's Secret Pogrom: The Postwar Inquisition of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee, Yale University Press has published an abridged version of that long-suppressed trial and the events surrounding it.

The book, a stellar contribution to Soviet-Jewish historiography, is edited by Joshua Rubenstein, the author of Tangled Loyalties: The Life and Times of Ilya Ehrenburg, and Vladimir Naumov, the editor of the Russian-language edition of Stalin's Secret Pogrom. Both contribute insightful introductory essays.

It should be read in conjunction with The Moscow State Yiddish Theater: Jewish Culture on the Soviet Stage (Indiana University Press) by Jeffrey Veidlinger. Veidlinger's book is the first in English to trace the history of the Moscow State Yiddish Theatre, founded in 1919 and disbanded by Stalin 30 years later.

JAC, as Rubenstein explains, played a significant role in the Soviet Union's war effort, raising money in the West and encouraging support for the military alliance between Moscow and its democratic allies. It was headed by Solomon Lozovsky, the deputy minister of foreign affairs.

In June 1943, with the Soviet Union locked in a bitter struggle with Nazi Germany, JAC dispatched Mikhoels and Itsik Fefer, a renowned poet, on a seven-month tour of the West. Before their departure, they were personally briefed by Vyascheslav Molotov, the minister of foreign affairs. Mikhail Kalinin, the Soviet president, saw them off from the Kremlin, and Stalin personally bid them farewell.

Mikhoels and Fefer visited seven major American cities, spent several days in Canada and Mexico and concluded their mission in England. Jewish organizations, from Hadassah to B'nai Brith, lent their names and resources to making the visit a resounding success.

There were at least two highlights: a stopover in Hollywood where the periapetic pair met Thomas Mann, Upton Sinclair, Charlie Chaplin and Edward G. Robinson, among other personalities; and a jam-packed event in New York City's Polo Grounds where they were effusively welcomed by the mayor, Fiorello La Guardia.

Long before Mikhoels and Fefer embarked on their celebrated trip, Stalin began closing Yiddish schools and newspapers in the Soviet Union and suppressing Jewish culture in occupied Baltic states like Latvia and Lithuania.

According to Rubenstein, 1946 marked the beginning of the end for JAC. Lozovsky, its administrator, was relieved of his duties and replaced by Mikhail Suslov, a drab and officious functionary who claimed that JAC's work had become "politically damaging."

JAC, he wrote in a damning report, was "increasingly nationalistic [and] Zionist in character." Suslov called for its "liquidation."

Stalin agreed. Although he had denounced anti-Semitism in a 1931 interview with the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, had supported the creation of a secular Yiddish culture in the Soviet Union and had backed the formation of a Jewish autonomous region in Birobidzhan, Stalin was, at heart, an anti-Semite.

His twin decisions to close JAC and to suppress Jewish culture were sealed by the rapturous reception Soviet Jews accorded Golda Meir after her arrival in Moscow in 1949. She was Israel's first diplomatic representative in the Soviet Union.

Among the 15 defendants in the three-month 1952 trial were Fefer, Peretz Markish, David Hofshteyn and Leyb Kvitko. Charged with a range of capital offenses, from treason to bourgeois nationalism, they were brutally interrogated, as the transcripts reveal. Some were beaten and tortured.

Their families were not told about the executions until 1955. And news of the trial did not filter out until 1956.

Like Stalin's Secret Pogrom, The Moscow State Yiddish Theater tells a disquieting story.

Veidlinger, a professor of history and Jewish studies at Indiana University, explains that Stalin viewed the theatre – a venue of secular Jewish culture – as basically a vehicle of Soviet propaganda.

It initially produced plays by pre-revolutionary Yiddish writers, such as Sholem Aleichem and Sholem Asch, but later turned to the works of new Soviet Jewish novelists, such as Shmuel Halkin and David Bergelson.

With Mikhoels' murder, the theatre was shuttered, and many of its main figures were persecuted.

Illustrated by black-and-white photographs never before reproduced, this methodicallly-researched book is based on newly-opened archival material.

Read and weep.

Charming Mount Dora nicknamed Festival City

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

CENTRAL FLORIDA — Central Florida's Lake, Seminole, Polk and Highlands Counties – Florida's best-kept secrets right in the middle of the state – offer a plethora of sights and sounds that are quite different from your typical Florida attractions and activities.

Mount Dora is a southern city with a New England flair situated in Lake County, a 30-minute drive north-west of Orlando.

This charming place is nicknamed Festival City because of its many festivals, including the Festival of Music & Literature, the Antique Boat Show and the Bicycle Festival.

Mount Dora is also famous for its romantic sunset cruises, steam-train and trolley tours, boutiques and antique shops and 12 unique B & Bs, including Simpson's Bed & Breakfast and Mount Dora Historic Inn.

Not to be missed while in Lake County is Amazing Exotics, North America's largest authentic animal compound. Wildlife expert Jack Hanna showcases many of these protected animals on television. Brave guests can pre-book a face-to-face, hands-on encounter by calling 352-821-1234.

Seminole County, minutes north from downtown Orlando, is home to Seminole Safari and Adventure in Real Florida (407-349-2080). The eco-tour offers airboat rides, romantic excursions, canoeing and hiking and survivor packages, which, if you live through them, are guaranteed to make you "wilderness smart."

Sanford is one of the oldest cities in the county. The Valencia orange was introduced in Sanford, but when a freeze wiped it out in 1894, the citrus growers began planting celery, and by the 1900s, Sanford became known as Celery City.

In 1927, Abraham H. Moses built Sanford's Jewish Centre, sometimes called Beth Israel Temple. The local Jewish community owned it until 1968. At one time, Sanford's Jewish community outnumbered neighbouring Orlando's.

Fantasy of Flight (www.fantasyofflight.com) in Polk City, Polk County is an aviation theme park where visitors can reenact a fighter flight or be invited to help demonstrate the delicate manoeuvring of helicopter piloting aboard a simulator. Also in Polk County, in the Lake Wales area, is Cypress Gardens (www.cypressgardens.com). There are many attractions in this theme park and botanical gardens, including the Wacky Water Park, New Botanical Display, Wings of Wonder (a butterfly conservatory), Gator Gulch and the 2001 Ski Odyssey Ski Show.

Minutes from Cypress Gardens is Bok Tower Gardens (863-676-1408). The picturesque grounds surround a 205-foot-tall marble and coquina stone tower built in 1929 to house a musical carillon made of 57 bronze bells. Live recitals are offered daily at 3 p.m. At the gardens, you can check out the wildlife observatory, walk the Pine Ridge Nature Trail, examine endangered plants or bird watch.

Highlands County attracts thousands of fans to the Sebring International Raceway for their annual 12-hour race held in March (863-655-1442). Tours of the track are offered bi-monthly throughout the year. If speed is your thing, you can sign up to become a racer at the Panoz Racing School (www.panozracingschool.com). Owner Don Panoz built the Chateau Elan Hotel & Spa near the track's famous hairpin turn, conveniently close enough for racing students to get a tension-relieving massage after a rigorous day behind the wheel.

Sebring welcomed its first Jewish immigrants, Mike and Sadie Kahn from Lithuania, in 1921. By 1925, Kahn's department store occupied part of the ground floor of city founder George Sebring's Nan-Ces-O-Wee Hotel. The three-story building is the largest surviving commercial building in downtown Sebring. A little park next to it is dedicated to Sadie Kahn, who installed the first irrigation system in Highlands County, when the family acquired citrus groves and farmland in 1933. In the 1960s, the Kahn family created a Jewish cemetery by buying 100 contiguous gravesites at the municipal cemetery.

Nature lovers will enjoy Highlands Hammock State Park, where knowledgeable park rangers guide tram and walking tours. The Silver Harbor Lodge and Ranch on Lake Istokpoga (863-699-0035) is a family-owned business offering sport-clay shooting, wilderness tours and airboat rides, and where alligators swim and cattle graze right next to each other. If the bush is your thing, there is a large rustic cabin for rent – thankfully, it has electricity and running water!

Body 'N Soul Run planned

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Amy Lerman, a production co-ordinator for CITY-TV's Movie Television, and her fiance started to plan their wedding, they didn't choose a date to coincide with their schedules at work or their holiday time.

They planned it around the annual Body 'N Soul Run for Colon Cancer Research, of which Lerman is a founder and director.

The event, to be held this year on Sept. 9 at East Don Parkland at Leslie and Sheppard, is the fifth Body 'N Soul Run. Participation has grown from 100 – mostly family and friends in the first year, which still managed to raise $23,000 – to over 400 last year, raising $110,000. In total, $230,000 has been raised since the run began.

The money goes toward both research into gastrointestinal cancer at Mount Sinai Hospital and raising public awareness.

Lerman became involved with colon cancer research after her mother died of the disease seven years ago at the age of 46. "I was 19, just finishing high school," said Lerman.

Now, her sister's husband has it, and she knows that she herself is at risk.

Although many people don't know much about this illness, it is "the second highest cause of cancer-related deaths of both men and women," she said.

At the same time, if it's detected early, it is one of the most curable.

The registration fee of $25 a person, or $50 a family, entitles each participant to a T-shirt and a water bottle.

There is a five-kilometre walk and a 10-kilometre run. Registration begins at 9:30 a.m., and the walk/run begins at 10:15.

Hockey great Darryl Sittler and his wife Wendy, who has colon cancer, are honorary chairs.

There will be a raffle, with prizes that include tickets to a Maple Leafs home game, a digital camera, a day at the Windsor Arms Spa, and a top prize of a $10,000 gold and diamond eternity band. Raffle tickets are available at the walk4cancer Web site (address below) and at malls in the GTA.

A silent auction offers 50 packages, including an all-expenses-paid trip to Mexico, spa packages, a computer, and home home gym equipment.

"I feel really good doing it," Lerman mused. "I understand the importance of what I am doing."

For more information, call 905-731-2035 or 1-888-571-8547. You can also visit the Web site at www.walk4cancer.com, or e-mail them at walkforcancer@hotmail.com.

CHAT grad biking to New York

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A CHAT grad who has moved to Israel is back in Canada this summer and is biking from Toronto to New York to keep fit and raise awareness of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) and the Orthodox Union (OU).

Itamar Danziger, 20, is an experienced cyclist who has pedalled thousands of kilometres in central and northern Europe during several summer vacations. This year, he's keeping his road show local with a 2,300-kilometre route that will take him to Ottawa, Montreal, Boston and New York. He expects to start his trip with modest 150-kilometre jaunts, but once he builds up his strength, he'll boost his output to between 200 and 270 kilometres per day.

Itamar Danziger

Generally, he spends 14½ hours on the road, of which 13 hours are spent in the saddle. When he's not peddling, he stops for breaks, to eat and to stretch. He consistently cranks out speeds of 20 to 23 kilometres per hour on his 18-speed mountain bike – not world class, but not bad for a guy who's doing it for fun.

The Can-Am trip far exceeds Danziger's longest Euro pedal, when he travelled about 1,500 kilometres from Constance, Germany, to Strassbourg, France, and back.

Other bike trips he's taken include visits to Zurich and Basel, Switzerland; Bregenz, Austria; Worms (Rashi's yeshiva town) and Mainz, Germany; Copenhagen, Denmark; Helsingborg, Sweden; and Liechtenstein.

Danziger's excellent adventures started in 1997 when his family planned a vacation in the "triangle" area bordering Germany, Switzerland and Austria. His older brother, Uri, inspired by a CHAT gym teacher who'd gone on European cycling trips, suggested bringing their bikes along. It was a great suggestion, Danziger said. They loved the exercise and the gorgeous countryside.

"The scenery is awesome and you really feel good when you get there. Your body really feels great and since I started, I've lost 40 pounds," Danziger said.

In 1999, he made his first long-distance Canadian trip, cycling to Montreal. The trip took him five days, including a two-day stay in Kingston.

He's also biked to Niagara Falls, Buffalo, and last summer, he enjoyed a number of local day trips to Stouffeville, Uxbridge, Canal Road, Oshawa, Pickering, Bolton, King City, Queensville, Port Perry, Lake Scugog and Lake Simcoe.

In Israel he does no biking, what with time spent at his psychology studies at Bar-Ilan University and given a paucity of biker-friendly sideroads in the Jewish State.

Danziger is dedicating his New York trip to NCSY, the Orthodox youth group he joined as a seventh grader. "I had an amazing experience growing up with NCSY," he said. "I frequently attended their weekend Shabbatons, which were extremely fun."

Over the course of his high school years, Danziger moved up the NCSY ladder, and he now serves as a counsellor with NESTO. NCSY's mirror organization in Israel.

"Itamar Danziger is one of our success stories," said NCSY director Rabbi Dovid Kaminetsky. "His ride on behalf of our organization speaks to his tremendous character and embodies the credo that NCSY instils in all its participants – to utilize their strengths to make a difference in the larger Jewish community."

Bowlers win Maccabiah gold

TORONTO — Canada's men's 10-pin bowling team can be added to the list of medal winners at the recently concluded Maccabiah Games in Israel.

The six-man team won gold, thanks to a nail-biting victory in the last frame of the last game of a gruelling six-game tournament.

Gold medalists include: Hersh Schnayer, Larry Beaver, Howard Dinetz, Louis Sturm, Tony Selcer and Sheldon Goldstein.

Israeli shines at Canadian tennis tourney

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

MONTREAL — Some of the best products that come from Israel include Jaffa oranges, falafel and... tennis players?

Based on the performances of the Israelis in the past two $2.95-million Tennis Masters Series, Canadians may rethink the commonly held belief the best tennis players in the world come from America or Australia.

Last summer, Harel Levy won the hearts of Canadians at the York University tennis grounds in Toronto when he advanced all the way to the finals. This was the best result by an Israeli in the 111-year history of the tournament. Most observers thought the feat would never be duplicated.

It almost happened again at this year's Tennis Masters Series event held at the Jarry Tennis Centre in Montreal. This year's Israeli hero was Noam Behr, a 25-year-old career journeyman ranked 198, who competed in Granby last month and in other small cities around the globe in the Challenger series (the tennis equivalent of the minor leagues).

Behr was the lowest ranked of the 32 players in the qualifying round. He went on to defeat two higher-ranked opponents to qualify. He won his first-round match, and in the second round, was within a whisker of forcing a third set in a match against the 16th-seed opponent.

Behr blew by both American Oren Motevassel 6-2, 6-0, and Wayne Black of Zimbabwe 6-0, 6-2, and prevailed against David Prinosil of Germany 6-1, 7-6 (7-2). Behr was brilliant and dominated his opponents with consistent serves and strong backhands.

"It is always a mistake to look past your next opponent in tennis, but I remember what Harel did last year and felt confident about moving ahead," said Behr.

Behr was a heavy underdog against the highly ranked (33rd) and experienced American Jan-Michael Gambill. The heat was intense (40 degrees) on the court, and Behr seemed dead after losing the first set 6-3.

He thrilled the fans in the second set with his gutsy play. Gambill was leading 5-4, serving for the match, but Behr broke his serve with a backhand down the baseline to square the set at five games each. Behr prevailed to force the tie-breaker and matched Gambill point by point for a 7-7 tie. In the end, Gambill wore down Behr with superior shot placement to win the tiebreaker and the match 6-3, 7-6 (9-7).

Like Levy, Behr had the best tournament of his career in Canada and proved he was better than merely a journeyman. "I had the best results of my career here and – who knows – a few points here and there played a little differently and I may still be in the draw," said Behr.

Behr grew up playing tennis at the Israel Tennis Centres, beginning at age eight. He dabbled in basketball, but his brother Yoav became the hoops star in the family by signing a contract with Hapoel Tel Aviv.

Levy did not come close to the fireworks he created last year. He had the bad luck of drawing Wimbledon runner-up Patrick Rafter in the opening round. Levy tested Rafter in the first set, serving five aces en route to a 7-6 (7-5) lead after winning the first set.

But instead of continuing the form he displayed last summer, Levy let Rafter back into the match by losing serve in the next two sets. Rafter switched gears with strong serves and forehands to win the next two sets 6-3, 6-3. Rafter won the match and shut down Levy's dreams of a repeat of last year's heroics.

"I played aggressively, but also stupidly in the first set," said Rafter.

"You can't underestimate what a gutsy player like Harel can do. The tour has a lot of talent and the difference between a guy ranked first or 100 is very, very small."

The 53rd-ranked Levy put up a dogfight – at least in the first set – and proved by his results in the past year that his days as a journeyman are over. Levy's impressive credentials include beating Pete Sampras on clay and finishing as a semi-finalist at the Tennis Masters Series – Rome, in May.

He defeated Andrew Ilie and Wayne Ferreira on hardcourt to finish in the semis at Scottsdale. Then he beat hometown Brit Tim Henman and American star Andy Roddick on the grass in July to finish as a finalist in a tournament in Nottingham, England.

Levy's expectations were high, but his memories of last year will never waiver. "I had the best time of my life last year. Having the support of the Jewish community and flying in my father and coach to see me win in such a dramatic fashion on my birthday is a thrill I will never forget," said Levy.

Levy is heir apparent as the next big Israeli star following the legendary Shlomo Glickstein and Amos Mansdorf.

Makes you wonder... who's going to surprise us from Israel at next year's tournament?

Seniors & Health

Dr. Shelley Veinish

Dear Dr. Veinish,

I'm a widowed senior who is finding it difficult to get excited about making meals. I'd like to have tasty meals, but it hardly seems worth the effort just for me; besides, I'm all out of ideas.

Rose

Dear Rose,

This is a dilemma we all face at some time, regardless of how many people we are cooking for. Whether you're having a tough time adjusting to making smaller meals or are simply out of ideas, it's always important to eat well. Healthy eating can help you feel your best each day. To answer your question, I consulted Carol Robertson, a registered dietitian at Baycrest Centre.

Before we tackle the shopping list, it's important to consider how and where you do your shopping. Depending on your mobility, you may need more or less help. Call your local store to find out what services are available for seniors. Let them know your needs, as well. Do they provide assistance with shopping during non-peak hours? Do they take telephone orders and/or deliver? Alternatively, if you're comfortable using the Internet, consider online shopping. The dietitian at your local public health unit can also help you identify the services available in your area.

Drink at least eight to 10 glasses of fluids each day and eat a variety of foods, including whole grains, milk products and fruits and vegetables. Choose the most colourful items when selecting fresh produce. If the quantity is too great, ask a clerk to repackage it. Some varieties of canned vegetables contain a lot of salt. Frozen veggies are a convenient and nutritious alternative, especially if you have been asked to watch your salt intake. Remember to check the "best before" dates on perishable foods.

Purchase items such as rice, legumes, and dried fruits from bulk food bins that enable you to buy exactly what you need. You can divide larger amounts of fish and poultry into single portions at home. Seal them, label them, and freeze them for future use. You can do the same with leftovers after a meal. Frozen entrees for one can also be a fast and easy option for those occasions when you just don't want to have to think!

Eggs are also a versatile and economical source of protein and other nutrients. One great way to enjoy them is in a vegetable frittata. You can add different vegetables and seasonings for variety. Bon appetit.

VEGETABLE FRITTATA

This recipe serves two. For one serving, reduce the vegetables to about 1 cup and use 2 eggs instead of 3.

2 cups fresh or frozen mixed vegetables, cut bite-size
3 eggs
¼ tsp. dried basil or other herbs that you enjoy pinch of salt and pepper to taste
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
½ small onion, slice (use the whole onion if you like)

In a saucepan, bring 2 cups water to a boil. Add vegetables and cover. When water returns to boil, drain vegetables (or follow your microwave directions for vegetables).

Beat eggs with basil or other herbs, salt and pepper. Heat oil in a non-stick skillet over medium heat. Add onion and saute for about 3 minutes. Add vegetables and saute until hot. Pour eggs over. Reduce heat to medium-low. Cover and cook until set.

You can enjoy this great dish with a multigrain roll or toast and some fruit and yogurt for dessert.

Per serving: About 300 calories, 15 grams protein, 15 grams fat, 29 grams carbohydrate, 9 grams of fibre.

Recipe adapted from Eat Well, Live Well – For a Lifetime!, Dietitians of Canada, 1999

About Parenting

I try to be a relaxed yet youthful- spirited mother to my two little boys, but when it comes to their eating habits I just cannot help myself – I act like a stereotypical food-pushing bubbie.

Rebecca Katz

When my eldest son, who is a fussy eater, opens his mouth for a vegetable or some cheese or even for a morsel of raisin challah, I get excited – really excited!

I can credit my mother-in-law for influencing the I-must-schtip-a-tonne- of-food-in-the-kids'-mouths neurosis that I have developed.

Bubbie, a professional food pusher, will follow my son around a room as he plays with toys, strategically placing noodles, boiled chicken and broccoli into his mouth. If he is pretending to be Batman, he may hear a story about why Batman loves broccoli as she tucks a floret between his lips.

This shtick is a tough act to follow and I have stopped doing it since my second son joined us. I do not have the time to chase my son around with food and, in retrospect, it was ridiculous that I ever did it. Boy, did he have things good in our house!

I sought advice on how to reform my son's eating habits from books, friends and his doctor. I learned that I should offer food at three regular mealtimes instead of the hourly schedule I was following. Miraculously, he is now capable of eating at a table, using cutlery, and chomping on the food that is placed before him (grilled fish included).

Linda McCharles, a registered dietician at Alysse Fogel & Associates, explains that giving children food throughout the day is a bad practice.

"You are going to end up with a child who will never really establish their hunger cues. They will never know when they are full or hungry because you are suppressing those cues."

McCharles suggests that snacks be eaten no less than an hour before each meal. As well, she recommends at least one parent or caregiver should sit down at the table while the child is eating to establish a pattern where the family sits at the table for dinner.

I admit that I still suffer from the food-schtipping neurosis. However, with my second son recently becoming an adventurous solid food eater, I finally know what it feels like to be one of those parents who can serve more than just noodles, hot dogs and chicken. This kid actually enjoys eating – I am talking feta cheese and tomatoes. I kvell just thinking about it!

Readers may submit questions or comments to Rebecca Katz at rtkatz@hotmail.com. But she is not a professional, and her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, please consult a professional.

Fight rages over UN conference

Arab bloc maintains anti-Israel agenda

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Arab countries have succeeded in placing the Zionism-equals-racism issue on the agenda of a major United Nations conference on human rights and racism, and Jewish groups are scrambling right down to the wire to contain potential damage.

In the last of a series of preparatory committees (called "prepcoms") held in Geneva earlier this month, Western delegations, including those from Canada and the United States, failed to persuade the Arab bloc to abandon a bid to attack Israel and Zionism at the week-long conference, to begin Aug. 31 in Durban, South Africa.

It's still unclear what form the anti-Zionist language will take at the World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance (WCAR). Delegates aren't sure whether the issue will be introduced in a resolution from the floor, or whether the noxious and often anti-Semitic rhetoric will simply permeate the global gathering, in an attempt to isolate Israel.

But one thing is certain: The words "Zionism" and "racism" will be equated in a proposed text at the conference, one that could be presented as part of an international declaration of what constitutes racism. One section of a text says Zionism "is based on racial superiority."

Also of concern to Western delegates has been the attempt by Arab states to trivialize the Holocaust by using the word in lowercase and/or plural, and applying it to describe Israeli policies against Palestinians. Another clause refers to Jewish settlements in the territories as "ethnic cleansing."

Everyone involved agrees that diplomatic jockeying will continue, even after the conference begins.

The News in Brief

Canada

Collins Loses

OTTAWA — The Supreme Court of Canada has dismissed a legal challenge brought by former Vancouver newspaper columnist Doug Collins. Collins, who has been accused of writing anti-Semitic articles, sought to have constitutionality of British Columbia's human rights code argued in the B.C. Supreme Court rather than the B.C. Human Rights Tribunal. In 1999, the same tribunal ordered that Collins and the North Shore News must each pay Harry Abrams of Victoria $2,000 as compensation for four columns written by Collins.

Manley's Calls

OTTAWA — Foreign affairs minister John Manley telephoned his Israeli counterpart, Shimon Peres, following the Aug. 9 suicide bombing in Jerusalem, and offered his condolences. Manley also spoke with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat. Manley welcomed Arafat's condemnation of the bombing but also called on him to "do more to exercise control over those who resort to such detestable acts and other forms of violence."

El Al's Losses

JERUSALEM — El Al will post record losses of $160 million in 2001 due to lost tourism caused by the current violence, Yediot Achronot reported. After losing $109 million last year, El Al needs to reduce expenses by 25 percent to continue operating, the newspaper added.

Kurds To Return

JERUSALEM — A group of some 40 Kurds, including women and children, tried to cross into Israel last week from Lebanon. Israeli authorities were expected to return them to Lebanon.

World

Joint Statement

SKOPJE — Jewish leaders in Macedonia have joined Muslims as well as officials from the Macedonian Orthodox, Roman Catholic and Methodist churches in a joint declaration condemning the ongoing violence in the former Yugoslav republic.

Irving's Offer

LONDON — Holocaust denier David Irving has offered to pay Penguin Books $210,000 if the publisher and historian Deborah Lipstadt drop all further claims against him. Last year, a British court ordered Irving to pay Penguin's and Lipstadt's legal costs, estimated at $3 million, when he lost a libel suit against them over Lipstadt's book Denying the Holocaust.

Probe Requested

BUDAPEST — Jewish leaders here have requested that state prosecutors probe whether a far-right parliamentary party incited hatred against Jews after it described the sale of Hungary's most popular soccer team to a leading Jewish businessman as "a betrayal of the Hungarian nation."

Shabbat Arson Attack

LONDON — An Orthodox family discovered a suspected serial arsonist trying to set fire to their home, but family members did not call the police because the incident happened on Shabbat. It was at least the seventh time since June that arsonists struck London's mainly Orthodox neighborhood of Stamford Hill.

Eruv Ruling

NEW YORK — A New Jersey town has the right to remove a wire boundary that forms an eruv because parts of it were built on public property, a U.S. judge has ruled. A lawyer for the Tenafly Eruv Association said his group will appeal the ruling.

Mayor Resigns

WARSAW — The mayor of Jedwabne, where Poles murdered hundreds of their Jewish neighbours in 1941, resigned because town councillors failed to support efforts to memorialize the war-time massacre. Krzysztof Godlewski stepped down after a commemoration last month in which President Aleksander Kwasniewski begged forgiveness for the massacre but insisted that residents bore no collective responsibility for it. The mayor said the local council refused to approve spending to build a new road leading to a memorial to the slain Jews.

Canada Not on Par, Leaders Say

OTTAWA — In a briefing for their respective organizations on their participation in a July meeting in Washington, D.C., of the board of directors of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, Canadian Jewish Congress executive vice-president Jack Silverstone and Michael Rosenberg, president of Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada, expressed concern that Canadian Jewish survivors are not getting a sufficient share of institutional support from the conference.

Rosenberg observed that Australia, which has about the same proportion of all survivors as Canada (four percent), has received three times the institutional funding from the Claims Conference that Canada has.

"We must ensure that Canadian Jewish organizations show no complacency in seeking institutional funds to support Holocaust survivors and long-term education on the Holocaust. Time is running out and funds are not limitless."

Silverstone pledged CJC would continue to work with its UIA/Federations Canada partners to publicize the availability of funds and the criteria for applying. He noted that the conference "can only process applications it receives."

Web sites praising 'jihad' worry Jewish groups

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two Canadian-registered Web sites that glorify jihad (holy war) and describe Jews as treacherous enemies of Islam have Jewish groups worried.

Last week, officials with the B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) office in Montreal held talks with national security officials over www.Islamway.com.

Both BBC and Canadian Jewish Congress say the site itself does not incite hatred or violence against Jews. Rather, it is a discussion board that allows users to post messages to the site that is worrisome.

One message is headed "An invitation to jihad," and invites Muslims to report for commando training in paramilitary camps in Afghanistan, where "mujahid brothers will accept you with open arms," and "within a period of two weeks, [you] will be sent to the frontline."

Another posting is headed "Jewish terrorism," and lists Palestinian leaders who have been killed by Israel in recent months. A third heading, "Jihad," posted by "Sadiq," speaks of "cursed Jews" who are "the worst enemies of Islam," and urges readers "to fight against Jews."

Jihad, it adds, is an "obligation ordained by Allah," and "part of good deeds."

The site is registered to a Montreal address, while the administrative contact is listed as a second address in Montreal, which runs another site, www.themuslimwoman.com.

Message board spreads 'vicious anti-Semitic material'

CJC has traced the site's host to Sugar Land, a suburb of Houston, Tex.

"We find it offensive that discussion so wild and intemperate is allowed," said CJC Ontario region's Len Rudner.

Nevertheless, Rudner said a "cursory" look at the site itself has led him to believe it is "not actionable. I'm not convinced it preaches genocide. But that's doesn't mean it's not reprehensible." Whether the postings constitute hatred is up to police and the courts, he pointed out.

A B'nai Brith spokesperson agreed the site does not promote violence, but that the message board spreads "vicious anti-Semitic material," and incites "extreme violence."

BBC will take the matter up with the site's Internet Service Provider (ISP), which allows it to be accessed on the Web.

The other site, www.qudscall.com, is run by Islamic Jihad, according to a recent issue of the Wall Street Journal. It includes a call to arms: "Our struggle with the sons of Israel in Palestine is on civilization, ideology, history and existence. Our war with them is long and difficult. Our base is the Qu'ran; our way is the jihad." Other sections glorify suicide bombers who have attacked Israeli civilians, and call for attacks on Jewish and American targets. It also solicits donations "for the military jihad."

The site is registered to a name and address in Toronto. However, the street name provided is misspelled, and the address, postal code and telephone number are all false – something CJC says will be taken up with the site's ISP.

The whole issue again raises the question of whether a site's host or ISP bears responsibility for messages posted by the public.

Rudner says if it's found that the sites are actually operated from outside Canada, the same frustrating jurisdictional issues will be raised as those surrounding dozens of neo-Nazi sites.

The Web sites' Canadian connection also lends credence to the warnings of late from experts that Canada is increasingly becoming a safe base of operations for Mideast terrorist groups, which take advantage of this country's lax refugee and immigration policies, advanced technology, proximity to the United States and generally quiet atmosphere, to go about their business.

The Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) investigates anyone in Canada who uses the Web "to support or engage in politically motivated violence," spokesperson Chantal Lapalme told The CJN.

Greater Toronto Area

Canadians, take note

From the editor's desk

For almost 11 months now, our attention has been focused, rightly so, on events in Israel. But there are also events and issues closer to home that warrant our attention and our comment.

In Quebec City, for example, the provincial government is intent on revamping the electoral map in a manner that will directly diminish the representative voice in the National Assembly of the anglophone community in general on the Island of Montreal and of the Jewish community in particular.

The government has proposed the elimination of three Montreal Island ridings, all of them presently held by Liberals in mainly anglophone areas. One of those ridings is D'Arcy McGee.

D'Arcy McGee has existed in its current boundaries for almost 40 years and in predictable political science behaviour since that time, has always offered forth candidates and returned deputies to the Assembly who embodied the riding's distinct community. They have always been Jewish; the incumbent is Lawrence Bergman.

Some observers have pointed out that the impact of the proposed reform would leave the east end of Montreal, an area historically home to a higher concentration of voters sympathetic to the separatist cause, with an average population of some 35,000 people. By contrast, the west end of the Island, historically less favourably inclined to separatism, including what would formerly have been D'arcy McGee, would be left with an average population of 45,000 people per riding.

According to Casper Bloom, honorary legal counsel for the Canadian Jewish Congress, the PQ government has justified this blatant inequity in the representative voices between east and west Montreal on the basis that the east end is "poor."

Such an explanation by the government is breathtakingly spurious. Since when, in a representative and responsible democracy, has the socio-economic class of a riding ever determined the ratio between number of voters and number of elected? It has never been done; it is hardly appropriate to start now.

This particularly objectionable proposal by the PQ government, suggests a motive aimed more at reducing the ranks of the anglophone, non-separatist Opposition in the National Assembly than at legitimately reforming the electoral map.

Moreover, the plan to eliminate the specific riding of D'Arcy McGee flies in face of the spirit, if not even the letter of the law, that prescribes the ideal riding constituency. Article 15 of the Quebec Election Act requires that an "electoral division represent a natural community established on the basis of demographic, geographic and sociological considerations."

It is this statutory definition that helps explain why the riding of D'arcy McGee has always returned a Jewish MNA. The riding has a very large Jewish population; as a result, it demographically and sociologically falls within the definition contemplated by the statute as a "natural community."

To disburse the existing "natural community" of voters into other ridings, to destroy the possibility or likelihood that this "natural community" would return a deputy who so obviously springs from its demographic and sociologic base, who so obviously "is" that community, is to violate the intent of the current law. This is what is so objectionable the PQ government's proposal.

We share the view of this electoral ploy expressed by incumbent Bergman that it would be a "severe and unacceptable blow to the Jewish community." However, we would state the case even higher. It is a severe and unacceptable blow to the people of Montreal, Quebec, and even of Canada.

The proposed rejigging of riding boundaries is self-serving manipulation of the democratic process for inappropriate, expedient, partisan aims.

It is therefore heartening to note that a broad-based coalition of nearly 50 Jewish organizations, synagogues and institutions have mobilized to reverse the government's decision.

Many people from outside the riding, from outside the incumbent's political party and from outside the Jewish community itself, support the coalition because they all understand that what is truly at stake is not simply the loss of a Jewish MNA in the Assembly, but rather the loss of belief in the system's integrity.

The government of Quebec has set up public hearings Sept. 10-12. The unacceptability of its proposal should be forcefully protested at those hearings even as the contrary will of the vast majority of the D'Arcy McGee's residents is established through the massive signing of a petition currently being circulated in the riding, "demanding that the Quebec National Assembly preserve the riding in its entirety and maintain the actual number of ridings on the Island of Montreal as they adequately represent the density of population and ensure an effective representation of the electorate."

Isn't that, after all, the underpinning of our democratic electoral system?

If the PQ government is successful in imposing its reconfigured electoral maps, it will undoubtedly have far-reaching implications on the rest of Canada. But that is their plan. And that is why all Canadians should be concerned.

Nurenberger founded The Canadian Jewish News

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Meyer Nurenberger, a longtime and outspoken newspaperman, passionate Herut-Likud supporter, and the founder of The Canadian Jewish News, died recently of Alzheimer's disease. He was 90.

Obituary

Born in Krakow, he moved to France and later Belgium, where he was educated, eventually becoming a parliamentary reporter. In February 1939, seeing the writing on the wall for European Jews, according to his daughter, Atara Beck, he moved to the United States.

"He pleaded with his family to come with him, but they refused," she said. "He never saw them again."

A little known fact about him, she said, is that in New York, he received the highest order of smichah, rabbinic ordination, from Rabbi Yehuda Gershuni. He never used the title "rabbi," however.

He worked for the Jewish Morning Journal, a New York Yiddish daily. In 1947, he became its editor.

During World War II, Nurenberger served as a war correspondent for the U.S. army. He covered both the Nuremberg trials, and later the trial of Adolf Eichmann.

At Eichmann's trial, Beck said, "he ostentatiously wore a large black yarmulke and sat in court reading a Yiddish newspaper.

In 1957, at the request of Menachem Begin, later prime minister of Israel and a longtime friend, and with the assistance of several other Likud supporters including Sam Shainhouse, he moved to Toronto, to edit Der Yiddishe Journal, a Yiddish weekly. When the offices burned down, he decided, together with his late wife, Dorothy Cohn Nurenberger, to begin a weekly, English language newspaper, The Can-adian Jewish News.

Meyer Nurenberger

Beck recalls that before publication began, the family received death threats from local anti-Semites, so vicious that they were given police protection.

He published The CJN until 1971, when, after the death of his wife, he sold it to the present owners. Unable to resist the lure of the newspaper world, in 1974, he founded the Jewish Times, which he used to promulgate his unabashed view of the Jewish world and to take frequent potshots at his former publication.

During those years, he also wrote the main editorial column for the Algemeiner Journal, a New York Yiddish weekly.

At the same time, he researched and wrote The Scared and the Doomed – The Jewish Establishment vs the Six Million, espousing his belief that European Jewry could have been saved, not only if the general community had not remained indifferent and uncaring, but if Jews in the United States had been able to put aside their differences and egos and work together. It was published in 1985.

Besides maintaining a close friendship with Begin, Nurenberger was a strong influence on former prime minister John Diefenbaker, who, Beck said, he encouraged to speak out in Parliament in favour of the Jewish State.

Although, as friend Lou Silver said at his funeral, Nurenberger was completely dedicated to Israel and the Jewish people, he cared for everyone.

Nurenberger was well-known as a raconteur and an inspired conversationalist. Shainhouse and others recalled looking forward with anticipation to spirited discussions over coffee and in shul. The family home was filled with lively discussions about Israel, politics, literature and music, Beck said.

"All ages got along with him," she said, describing her friends delighting in his company, and his telling eagerly awaited stories to his granddaughter's class.

He was an intellectual, interested in a great many different things. He spoke eight languages, and, Beck said, could read a few more.

His greatest happiness lay in his family, she said. "It was a simchah for all of us to be together."

Most of all, Beck said, "he loved life, and lived it to the fullest."

Nurenberger was predeceased by his wife Dorothy, and daughter Cynthia Berke. He is survived by daughters Ilana Ovadya and Atara Beck, 11 grandchildren and one great-grandchild.

Thornhill student takes part in international summit

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL— Alysa Brenner was one of the few students on a recent international program who was not a would-be prime minister or president.

The recent graduate of the French immersion program at Langstaff Secondary School was in Washington, D.C. for a week in July as part of the Future World Leaders Summit.

The program, run under the auspices of a civic education organization known as Presidential Classroom, brought together some 350 English-speaking students, age 16 to 19, from around the world. She is now in touch by e-mail with students from Japan, South Africa, Italy and other parts of Canada. There were no students from Israel or any Arab countries, she reported.

The best part, said Brenner in a recent interview at her home, was meeting students from dozens of countries and learning that "we're really all the same."

One issue on which they could not agree was whether homosexuals should be allowed in the army, but for the most part students had similar interests and concerns, and found that they laughed at the same things.

Unlike most of her counterparts at the conference, however, Brenner's main area of interest lies in science, not political science. She wants to pursue a career in cancer research, and will begin studies at the University of Western Ontario this fall in a new program leading to a bachelor of medical science degree.

It was her interest in being well-rounded that led her to the D.C. program as well as to the Forum for Young Canadians held in Ottawa in March. The Canadian program involved a week at the House of Commons with students from across Canada, participating in an intensive program on Canadian politics.

Brenner's diverse interests are reflected in her involvement on her school newspaper as sub-editor, in a student club called RACE (Racial Acceptance, Cultural Equality) as coordinator of fund-raising, in her astronomy club membership and her involvement on school rugby and field hockey teams.

To qualify for the summit, she needed a grade point average of 4.0. Her average this year ranged from 90 to 93.

She was one of about four students from Ontario; there were 28 altogether from Canada. Interestingly, Brenner's impression was that the other students knew more about Jews than they did about Canadians. "We all came with so many stereotypes of different countries."

Their packed schedule – much of which Brenner found "very American-oriented" – included a private tour of the White House, a mock World Trade game, talks by a Holocaust survivor and by American vice-president Dick Cheney, who addressed his role in international relations and answered questions on topics ranging from AIDS to global warming.

Alysa Brenner (holding t-shirt) with Canadian delegation.

A trip to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum was a powerful experience; Brenner started crying as soon as she walked in, and no one spoke on the ride back to their dorm at Georgetown University. In fact, she found it so hard to tear herself away from the museum that she ended up missing her bus and had to take a later one.

The summit culminated in a United Nations-type conference on the last day, when delegates presented the results of workshops on issues like human arms control and nationalism. Brenner's group focused on child rights, touching on issues including child labour and child abuse.

Now that the summit is over, she feels her mind has been opened and that she has a heightened awareness of what goes on around her. She said she also realized how much she didn't know.

Brenner is optimistic about the future of the world. People are friends now because of this program, she said – even if their countries don't get along.

A matter of obligation

It has been nearly 20 years since Parliament, in December 1981, passed The Constitution Act that created the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. A profound, heartfelt, vigorous debate accompanied the enactment of that historic resolution. The debate, however, was not primarily over the substance of the rights and freedoms that distinguish Canadian life; rather, it was over the advisability of enshrining our rights and freedoms in a statute.

Then, as now, Canadians were unambiguous about the values for which this unique and marvellous country stands. They are encapsulated in the short preambular phrase preceding Section 1 of the Charter: "Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law."

Though the phrase "supremacy of God" has always been subject to interpretation, at a minimum, it means all human beings are equal in the eyes of God since all human beings are created "in the image of God." Indeed, it was this revolutionary concept, thousands of years ago, that was the foundation for the structure of democracy.

Thus, Canadians combine the ideals of equality, democracy and the rule of law within the framework of principled governance. These are our guiding values and the standards by which we conduct our lives. We look to the government of Canada to support and affirm them whenever necessary. It must do so as an obligation of trust to the people, of loyalty to the very values themselves and, finally, of conscience.

It is now urgently necessary for the government to reaffirm these democratic ideals. Security agencies have confirmed that two Islamic terrorist groups operate incendiary Web sites in this country. One site registered in Toronto was apparently set up by Islamic Jihad, the sister group to Hamas, both of which openly plan, execute and celebrate the murder of Jews in Israel and abroad. The other site, registered in Montreal, recruits individuals to train in Afghanistan, presumably for military operations against the "enemies of Islam," namely, Jews and others.

How is it conceivable that groups so publicly committed to the wholesale slaughter of other human beings should find shelter in Canada? Was the Canadian Constitution intended to provide a protective, legal canopy for the aims and activities of these terrorists? The government must not allow them to continue their work here.

In just over a week in Durban, the war against Israel will be carried by the Palestinian leaders and their supporters, most conspicuous of whom are the 56 members of the Islamic states, to a new battlefield: the United Nations Conference Against Racism. As has been widely reported, the conference has been hijacked into a slanderous show trial against Israel, Zionism and other key credos of the Jewish people. The important work that was originally intended for Durban will be shunted aside for the prevaricating polemics of the Palestinians leaders.

We urge the government of Canada to vociferously, vehemently denounce this sly, dishonest campaign against Israel and the Jewish people.

It is a matter of obligation for Canada, for Canadians and all others committed to the values of equality, democracy and the rule of law.

Diaspora Jewry must show concern

We are privileged to be living following the fulfilment of our people's 200-year-old dream. Israel is strong and vibrant. The ingathering of our people continues unabated. The level of construction in our united capital is such that people joke that the crane should be the national bird. The leadership of the country and the city of Jerusalem is in the hands of people with clear-headed vision, strength of purpose and passionate belief.

But there is a malaise in the land. The country finds itself in circumstances where although it is not at war, there is a macabre daily ritual of the sacrifice of Jewish lives on the altar of world public opinion.

Now more than ever, we need to show our concern and caring and demonstrate that we are one people and that our enemies can't divide us. If we fail to do so, I fear that such lack of courage will cause an irreparable rift between Israeli and Diaspora Jews.

I challenge every Jew who has ever taken pride in the State of Israel and its accomplishments, who has ever sung Am Yisrael Chai, to pick up the phone today, now, and call his travel agent or synagogue or the UJA and make arrangements to visit.

This is something we must do. If we don't do it now, we won't get a second chance.

Sharon's policy not wise

It would be foolish to pretend that the Israeli strike in Nablus on July 31 was not an escalation in the use of force. Of course it was: deliberately so. If we accept Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's way of thinking, then this escalation is the necessary next step and the right thing to do, at the right time.

In Israel and many other places around the world, there is a great deal of support, among Jews and non-Jews alike, for this type of logic. Admittedly, violence may not be the preferred choice, but it is the best from among the available options: in Israel's case, it is the strategy of necessity and defence.

It is that same kind of strategic thinking that compelled Sharon to lead the Israeli army into Lebanon 19 years ago, and took him to Temple Mount last September.

As a Jew, my difficulty with this way of thinking is that it runs contrary to every value that I have come to accept as fundamental to Judaism. It is abhorred by the Torah, the Talmud and our sages at least since the time of David and Solomon. It prioritizes revenge and the pursuit of justice without concern for mercy – expediency above principle.

I believe this is a critical time for Jews and Judaism: are these the kinds of strategies that we wish to encourage and support? For me, to support them I would have to displace the supremacy of peace above all values; I would have to suspend my commitment to Hillel's aphorism, "That which is hateful unto you, do not unto others." I cannot do that and yet remain true to myself as a Jew.

While some may debate whether or not Sharon's strategies are intelligent, without doubt, they are not wise.

Birthright evokes privilege

My recent Israel Birthright trip was absolutely amazing.

We were all around the country: the Golan Heights, Mount Arbel, the Jordan River, the Dead Sea and Masada. On Friday, we went to the Western Wall for Shabbat, one of the most powerful experiences I've ever had. To see so many people of different backgrounds praying, singing, dancing and sharing in the celebration at the end of the week and to know that this celebration occurs every week! Amazing.

In terms of security, the situation, while serious, is so overdramatized it's sad. Tourism here is hurting very badly as people cancel their trips in fear. We were constantly thanked by every single Israeli citizen, shopkeeper, administrator, politician and soldier with whom we came into contact. They were so happy that we were there. We each felt touched and privileged to have been given this incredible gift; for some of us, it changed our lives forever.

Israelis are so vibrant, so strong and willful, so dedicated to supporting their country. I look in admiration and respect at a people, my people, who have been through so much and have so many problems to work out, yet go forth with drive and determination.

As we spent time with Israelis our age, learning about their radically different lives, and spent time with Israeli elementary school children assembling gift packages for soldiers, we noticed how independent and driven these kids are as they take part in something that is integral to broader Israeli life.

The triviality of North American life stands in stark contrast. When we were eighteen, some of our biggest concerns were whether or not we were going to get the car that night and what we should wear to the next party. In Israel, however, children enter the army for three years at that age. Needless to say, they grow up very quickly and, most importantly, work towards something that is essential to the survival of this country.

Copenhagen's Jews

By DAVID W.S. YUDIN
Special to The CJN

Last fall I spent a semester abroad at the University of Copenhagen on an exchange program with McGill University's faculty of law. With about 700 international students to accommodate, the University of Copenhagen has a large number of courses offered in English and provides one of the best curriculums for the study of European law.

Copenhagen, the capital and largest city of Denmark – its population is more than 1.5 million – seemed like the perfect place to spend a semester. In 1996, the city that produced Hans Christian Anderson and Soren Kierkegaard was named the cultural capital of Europe. Part of its charm lies in its very relaxed environment. The pace of life in Denmark is much slower than that in North America, and Danes generally have a refreshing joie de vivre. Most people in Copenhagen get around by bicycle. The city's canals, parks and castles make biking not only an efficient and non-polluting mode of transportation, but also a very enjoyable way to take in the beautiful scenery.

The only potential downside of being in Copenhagen was the tiny size of the Jewish community. My suspicions were confirmed when I had the honour (or burden?) of being the first Jew that most of my new friends had ever met!

Ironically, however, getting to know Copenhagen's Jewish community ended up being one of the most interesting aspects of my trip.

The city's Jewish community numbers about 7,000, a number that pales in comparison to Montreal's community of 90,000. Strangely enough, however, there are many similarities between our two communities. One similarity is their diversity. Montreal's community boasts not only large Sephardi and Ashkenazi communities but diverse ones as well. The Ashkenazi population of Montreal includes many recent Russian immigrants; the Sephardi community includes the second largest Diaspora Moroccan and Iraqi communities.

Copenhagen's Jewish community is also made up of several different groups. The first group of Jews to settle in Denmark were Sephardi Jews from Amsterdam and Hamburg. They were invited by the king in 1622 to run the country's finances. By 1814, the Danish king issued a decree granting all Jews in Denmark civic rights and duties as Danish citizens, marking the beginning of a long period of harmony between Denmark's Jewish and non-Jewish citizens. In contrast to many of her European neighbours, Denmark has been one of the most, if not the most, tolerant country for Jews to live in. This, of course, was exemplified most acutely by the tragedy of the Shoah and the miraculous story of the rescue of Denmark's Jewish community.

One of the most poignant memories I have of my visits to Israel and the Holocaust museum of Yad Vashem, is the hall of tombstones marking the number of victims in each country. The sharp contrast between the plaque marking Poland's three million victims and the plaque marking Denmark's 50 victims created a strong impression that has stayed with me. Of a community of thousands, only 50 Jews were killed in Denmark, despite its being occupied by Nazi Germany from 1940 to 1945.

Compared to the eagerness with which eastern and even western European citizens took part in the murder and torture of Europe's Jews, the Danish story is truly remarkable. It is reported that when Hitler approached King Christian X about the "Jewish problem in Denmark," the king replied, "In Denmark we have no 'Jewish problem,' we have only Danish citizens."

In 1943, Danish Jews were warned of the Nazi plan to deport all Jewish citizens to concentration camps. With the assistance of different Danish Resistance groups and individual participation, approximately 6,000 Jews were smuggled to Sweden on overnight expeditions using fishing boats. Of the 500 Danish Jews sent to Theresienstadt, 450 survived the war through the intervention of the Danish and Swedish Red Cross.

After the war, most of the Jews returned from Sweden. Today, their descendants make up one segment of the Jewish population. The rest of the community is made up of a large number of Jews who emigrated from Poland when those who were allowed out in 1969 sought refuge from the communist anti-Semitic campaign. Denmark was one of the few countries to grant citizenship to those Jewish refugees.

There are also a significant number of Jews of Middle Eastern and North African descent.

Yet also like Montreal's Jewish community, Copenhagen's community is declining, though at a far quicker rate. From a starting population of only 7,000, one can imagine that it is plagued by assimilation and emigration. There is only one synagogue (although there is also an informal minyan attended by some of the more religious families) and only one kosher "restaurant" – housed in the community centre and open only in the evening.

Attendance at the Jewish day school has plummeted in the last decade from about 50 students per class to 15. The people who attend synagogue are mostly elderly. Many of the young, committed Jews have chosen to emigrate to Israel or even England, where there are more Jews to interact with. Synagogue attendance varies greatly depending on the occasion. Shabbat evening services attract only a handful of people. Shabbat morning services, which attract many more people, still leave the 1,000- person-capacity synagogue almost empty. Yet many Jews come out during the High Holy Days. I was thrilled to see that on Yom Kippur, attendance was standing room only.

Currently, Denmark's Jewish community has a good relationship with the general population. More recently, however, the number of anti-Semitic incidents has risen as it has worldwide, because of the current intifadah raging against Israel. At the outset of the violence, many demonstrations in Copenhagen were held by recently immigrated Arabs, with the standard vitriolic chanting of "death to the Jews" and the burning of Israel's flag.

Nevertheless, overall relations with the Danish population remain harmonious. In fact, Danish Jews have historically made a large contribution to Danish society. Among the most notable examples is Baron Gedalja, who founded Den Danske Bank (The Danish Bank), which today is the largest bank in Denmark.

A statue honouring perhaps the most famous of Danish Jews, Niels Bohr, lies in the centre of town. Bohr, one of the founding fathers of modern physics and a Nobel laureate, is largely responsible for our current understanding of the structure of the atom and for developing, together with Albert Einstein, Max Planck and Werner Heisenberg among others, the theoretical framework for quantum physics.

Prominent members of the present- day Jewish community include Eran Drori, a Yemenite Jew and one of the most popular Danish pop singers. In addition, Isi Foighel is a former judge on the European Court of Human Rights and a former Danish Finance Minister; I had the privilege of taking a class with him. Finally, the former chief rabbi Bent Melchior, the father of outgoing Israeli Minister of Diaspora Affairs, Michael Melchior, is known and respected widely in Denmark for his works on religion and philosophy.

Perhaps as a symbol of the bond between Denmark and her Jews is a large square in the centre of town called Israel Square (Israels Plads). At its centre is a monument brought over from Israel with the following engraving: "This stone comes from the Holy Land as a gift to the Danish people in the name of Denmark's friends in Israel."

Visiting this monument, I realized that I had come full circle. Two years ago, I spent the summer in Jerusalem, living in an apartment across from Kikar Denya, or Denmark Square.

As Copenhagen's Jewish community fights for its life, within it remains a group of highly committed people. Despite its diversity and perhaps because of its small numbers, the community is very close-knit. Of the affiliated Jews, many are traditional and most of those attend the main synagogue in the heart of Copenhagen, which follows the Ashkenazi Orthodox tradition. Bnei Akiva is one of the most popular youth groups.

During my stay, I was able to participate in many activities, including a European Zionist congress with a distinguished panel of speakers including former Knesset Speaker Shevah Weiss. One of the highlights of my trip occurred right at the end when I joined 300 young Jews from Denmark, Norway, Sweden and Finland for the 75th annual New Year's getaway for Scandinavian Jewish Youth (SJUF) in nearby Gothenberg, Sweden. This event illustrated the spirit and energy that Scandinavian Jews, like most others, have when they come together in a show of unity and commitment. In fact, all the events I participated in showed that while the community is dwindling, the Jewish spark is still strong and on occasion it comes out in a robust show of force.

Like their non-Jewish compatriots, Danish Jews are somewhat withdrawn at first. Eventually, however, I met some extremely warmhearted, wonderful people who showed me what our sages meant when they said kol Yisrael arevim zeh lazeh (all of Israel is responsible for one another). Experiencing Ahavat Yisrael in a foreign country so far away with such a tiny Jewish community was an unexpected and delightful surprise.

'Welcome to Denmark'

Copenhagen, despite its Jewish community's long-standing harmonious relationship with the city's non-Jewish population, has recently been the site of increased protests due to the widespread, negative media exposure Israel has been receiving since the intifadah began last October.

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

COPENHAGEN — "Welcome to Denmark, Mr. Gillon," someone called from the crowd of reporters and photographers waiting at the exit doors of the El Al flight that landed last week in Copenhagen. Gillon, Israel's new ambassador to Denmark, and his wife, did not respond. With frozen faces they hurried through, accompanied by heavy security, to the VIP lounge. On the way, they seemed to thaw a bit.

"I am very happy to be Israel's ambassador to Denmark. It's a great honour," he said. "I'm sorry, but I will only be able to see you after I hand in my credentials to the queen."

The questions came at him from every direction. "Did you have any hesitations about coming?" "No," Gillon answered. "Will the problems involved in your posting last a long time?" "I hope not."

Wearing a pin of crossed Israeli and Danish flags on his lapel, Gillon left the terminal. A few Israelis and Danes waiting for El Al arrivals applauded him. Outside was a black limousine and police motorcycle outriders. The Danish foreign ministry's protocol officer received Gillon at the foot of the steps from the plane and accompanied him to the ministry's office in the capital, where he submitted a copy of his credentials to the chief of protocol's office. It was a friendly session. The Danish official welcomed the Israeli ambassador and wished him a pleasant posting in Denmark.

But the tight security left a different impression. Gillon was driven to his new home, a nice villa surrounded by greenery and a tall wooden fence. About an hour later, while the ambassador and his wife were unpacking, the first of the demonstrators gathered at the nearby train station.

Most of the protestors – a few hundred – were Arabs, some Palestinians. Under guard of about the same number of police, they marched to the embassy, raising Palestinian and Hezbollah flags and placards condemning "the hangman torturer Gillon."

"We don't want peace. We want war in Palestine," shouted some. Hebrew was also heard.

A little while later, union organizers and human-rights activists were prominent at a demonstration organized by leftist groups. Most of the Arabs left. A much larger gathering of about 1,000 people, the speakers called on the Danish government to act according to the UN Treaty Against Torture.

"Gillon committed massacres of our people," said Suleiman Zeidan, whose parents were born in Jaffa. "Denmark is a democratic country and we want to ask the Danish people to refuse to accept Gillon as an ambassador."

A 50-year-old woman with a Danish flag watched from the sidelines.

"I am here to welcome the ambassador," Inga Levin said. She has family in Israel and thinks Gillon is a brave man.

"It's sad that these demonstrators see only one side," she said. "A lot of bad things happen in the world and nobody says anything about it. But here [Gillon] said something and they jumped all over him. He was honest. Gillon supports peace and it's not true that all of Denmark is against him. Intelligent people see both sides and many support Israel. Everyone has to think of what they would do opposite a terrorist."

The task at hand

My friends are often surprised that I exhibit a strain of long-term pessimism regarding the strife in the Middle East. They have heard me say that neither in my lifetime nor in that of my children or even grandchildren will there be peace.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Since this belief seems to run counter to the traditional optimism of our people, I am challenged regularly to tell them why I have such a dark view of the future.

Those who attended a recent lecture by Itamar Marcus, representing Palestinian Media Watch, headquartered in Jerusalem, also came away deeply pessimistic. His fascinating address, supplemented by extensive excerpts from Palestinian media, made it crystal clear that the education Palestinian youth are receiving (and have received for some time) as well as Palestinian publications in general, harp on one major theme: that Islam considers war against the Jews and Israel as mandatory.

My personal knowledge of Islam leads me to the conviction that this is a perversion of the faith, which does not teach that Jews are the enemies of Allah, or that the killing of Jews is a religious obligation. In this nefarious teaching, the land between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea (which includes all of Israel) is a religious Wakf, that is, a religious trust. Any Muslim who relinquishes any part to Israel is believed to be damned to Hell.

All agreements with Israel are therefore seen as inherently temporary and can be signed by Muslims only because of Israel's current advantage. The ultimate destruction of Israel is a certainty.

This trend of thought recalls time and again the historical experience of the Crusades. The Christian invaders of the Holy Land occupied it for some two centuries, but in the end were chased out by Muslims. This history will be repeated with regard to Israel, so the teaching goes.

Does that mean then that peace with the Palestinians is unlikely or even an impossibility? If the teaching to which the Arabs inside and outside of the land are subjected today remains in place, the answer is, unfortunately, yes. In some ways this represents a revival of Nazi anti-Semitism, and it includes a denial of the Holocaust, a characterization of Jews as genetic liars, deceivers and aggressors, and leaves no room for compromise.

Our campaign, therefore, must not be directed against Palestinians as such, but rather at what they are being taught and what is being taught to their children. This may appear to some readers as a distinction that is too subtle – but there is nothing easy when it comes to our search for peace. We need a pervasive effort directed at all media, both here and there, acquainting them with the current campaign waged against us by educators and journalists.

Cupid and Judaism

Valentine's Day has never meant anything of significance to me. Most of the time I find myself laughing at those who take it seriously. In recent years, my boyfriend gave me flowers and a card even though I told him many times that I'm indifferent to the day and have no desire to celebrate it. The gifts would result in the usual "Oh you really shouldn't have" speech, not because I am ungrateful, but because I have never felt any sort of connection to the holiday. As far as I was concerned, Valentine's Day was just another money maker for the chocolate, floral and card industries and I would simply not be a part of it.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

I have always considered myself to be reasonably knowledgeable about Judaism, having attended a Jewish day school and a Jewish-based summer camp. I had assumed that I had learned about all of the Jewish holidays, but I was wrong.

Up until about two weeks ago, I had not heard of the holiday Tu b'Av. In a nutshell, for those who do not know either, Tu b'Av is a much older version of our present-day pagan Valentine's Day. In ancient times, Tu b'Av was a day where unmarried women would dance in the olive groves and vineyards in borrowed white clothing, in the hopes of meeting a husband and finding a match. There was a need for some joy after the sorrows of Tisha b'Av, and the event was a good way to bring young people together to celebrate something focused on them. The other significant part of Tu b'Av was that it was also the only day where males and females could marry out of their tribe.

Tu b'Av has also been associated with many positive events in Jewish history, unlike the holiday Tisha b'Av, which falls right before.

In modern day Israel, Tu b'Av is a day of celebration. For unknown reasons, it has never been celebrated outside of Israel. In Israel, however, the celebrations include dancing and partying on the beach – essentially enjoying the day and rejoicing about love.

It's unfortunate that this holiday is not more widely known. In a time where there is so much uncertainty and upset in Israel, it is even more important than ever to keep morale high and find reasons to celebrate. By celebrating Tu b'Av here, we could accomplish two things. First, we would be showing our unity with Israel by participating in such festivities. And, on a second and more personal note, we could make this an excuse to show our loved ones (including the extended list a la Valentine's Day) how we feel about them.

At Camp Kadimah this year, we celebrated Tu b'Av in a few ways. In our Shabbat services, we learned a little about the holiday and then discussed how we would like to celebrate it. Following Havdalah that night, we had a social with the theme of Tu b'Av, where the campers and staff all dressed in red and white. There was also a "marriage booth" and a few other fun things to enhance the day.

Do you celebrate Tu b'Av? If so, I'd love to hear about it. Please email me at drichler@hotmail.com and tell me what you do to celebrate this not-so-well-known holiday!

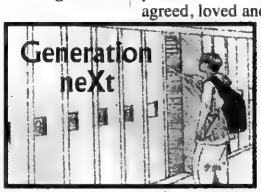
Igniting the future

By GILA ASHTOR

We are small but we are many
We are young but we unite,
To the candle of continuity
You are the flame, and we're the light.



It has been a long, long year. To think that this series began with my distaste of scientific explanations for Jewish survival and with The CJN's enthusiastic interest in Toronto's youth, seems almost to undermine the progress we have made. Ten months ago, I introduced myself as a confused, Grade 12 student, with the overbearing luggage of repressed questions. Today, I reintroduce myself, as a confused high school graduate with a trail of question marks behind me, and twice the amount ahead.

In the time I have written this column, I have been asked by peers and parents alike what I had hoped to accomplish. "How do you expect things to improve? You want to change the world? You're only 18. You can't do all that alone." And I, often intimidated by such verbal threats to my dreams, have always answered these questions in the same way, that I don't expect things to improve, we all do. That I don't plan on changing the world. We all will. And that, perhaps most importantly, I won't do it all alone.

You will help me – each and every one one of you, who in the past year have praised and criticized, agreed and disagreed, loved and hated every printed word of my idealism and your reciprocated interest. I will not direct the future of the youth in Toronto's Jewish community – your patience, your passion and your power will lead our future into the peace and war that awaits us. I will not guide our generation into the abyss of a sometimes resistant secular culture – your determination, dedication and drive will do that. And I will not be responsible for a modern answer to the ancient paradox of how Jews, when compared to light, can flicker for centuries, not having ever been dimmed or extinguished. You, my fellow community members are why our flame still flickers, and you are why the world still has light.

In the second verse of a popular new song by the young hip-hop artist Nelly Furtado, she says that there "has never been change without a fire." How apropos to close this quest for collective illumination with the understanding that if we are to envision a change, we must be prepared to ignite it ourselves.

To my peers and my friends, good luck. We are all moving forward into a world we don't yet know. May our heads help us and hearts protect us from the mystery of what lies ahead. To our ancestors and our links to the past, you have given us our voice and encouraged us to see the world, make sense of it, and dream of making it better. You have given us the torch of Jewish survival and continuity. Thank you, because, there is, after all, no future without your past.

But more than anything, let us remember that the Jewish candle is the poetic metaphor as much as it is the scientific enigma; we must always continue to live it, love it and light it – in order for it to shine.

This is Gila Ashtor's final column.

The Kirshner File

Soviet Union spawned a gang of criminals

During the détente period of the 1970s and 1980s, when the United States and the Soviet Union sought to minimize Cold War friction, Moscow relaxed its immigration procedures and permitted a fairly limited number of Soviet Jews to leave.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Among them were hard-core criminals. Having settled down in their new homes in the United States, Israel, Canada, Germany and elsewhere, they resumed their illegal activities with gusto.

These Russian mobsters have created a formidable criminal colossus whose wealth has surpassed the Colombian drug cartels, the Italian mafia and the Chinese triads, claims Robert Friedman in Red Mafiya: How the Russian Mob Has Invaded America (Little, Brown). It is a disturbing, hair-raising book.

Friedman, an investigative journalist based in New York City, says that these gangsters blend "financial sophistication with bone-crunching violence," and have become the FBI's most serious criminal adversary.

Operating in more than 50 nations, they smuggle heroin, traffic in weapons and run prostitution rings and casinos. In Russia, where they reportedly control 80 percent of the banks, they have siphoned off billions of dollars of Western loans and aid.

In North America, home to allegedly 30 Russian crime syndicates in cities stretching from New York to Los Angeles, the Russians have also engaged in money laundering and stock scams.

He claims that some 5,000 Russian criminals had established themselves in the New York region, and in particular Brooklyn's Brighton Beach district, by the early 1990s.

Canadian readers may be interested to learn that the Russian mob has infiltrated Toronto. Friedman names a Jewish émigré whose legitimate business affairs and community involvements are little more than a cover for arms trafficking, extortion and heroin smuggling.

In addition, the Russians are firmly ensconced in Israel. Friedman claims they have poured at least $4 billion and possibly as much as $20 billion of "dirty money" into its economy.

The mobsters Friedman chronicles were formed during the Leonid Brezhnev era, when the Communist state tolerated a criminal underworld while denying its existence. He believes the authorities turned a blind eye to black marketeers because they played a key role in feeding the Soviet Union's repressed appetite for consumer goods. Whether they enjoyed a Robin Hood-like reputation for honesty among the populace, as he suggests, is quite debatable.

Be that as it may, Russian criminal groups have penetrated virtually every level of government.

Friedman devotes a substantial portion of Red Mafiya, which lamentably lacks footnotes, to several of the most nefarious figures in the Russian mob.

They are a frightening lot.

The most powerful gangster in his cast of villains is Semion Mogilovich, who issued an anonymous death threat against Friedman.

A Ukrainian Jew born in Kiev, Mogilovich studied economics at the University of Lvov. Drifting into petty theft and counterfeiting, he was imprisoned for dealing currency on the black market. Then he made millions by fleecing Jews immigrating to Israel, buying their assets and reneging on a promise to reimburse them with hard currency.

Mogilovich and his top henchmen went to Israel in 1990, but soon grew disenchanted and moved to Budapest. There he bought a string of nightclubs and converted them into centres of prostitution. Mogilovich, who is said to have strong leadership qualities and acute financial skills, traffics in nuclear materials, drugs, precious gems and stolen art.

He supposedly controls a criminal empire through a global communication network of secure satellite telephones, cellular clone phones, encrypted fax machines, e-mail systems and state-of-the-art computers.

Mogilovich's associate, Monya Elson, whom Friedman describes as "an edgy man with a dark mien," is reportedly the mob's chief hit man, with 100 confirmed "kills."

Born in 1951 in Kishinev, the site of a 1903 pogrom that claimed the lives of 50 Jews, Elson grew up in a rough neighbourhood and turned to crime. In provincial towns like Kishinev, Friedman says, a cynicism and distrust of authority converged into an acceptance of criminality.

Semion Mogilovich

A deracinated Jew ignorant of Judaism and Jewish culture and history, he obtained an exit visa in 1977. Moving his family to a Jewish Agency transit camp outside Vienna, he subsequently lived in a refugee camp near Rome operated by the Hebrew Immigration Aid Society.

While he waited for a U.S. visa, he earned a living as a petty pickpocket. He arrived in the United States in 1978, free at last to wreak mayhem. "I could rob! I could steal! I could do whatever I wanted!" he told Friedman in an unguarded moment.

Elson teamed up with Yuri Brokhin, who had immigrated to the United States a few years earlier, and the pair embarked on a crime spree. Dressed up as haredim, they robbed jewellers. Burning with greed, Elson branched into extortion and cocaine running.

The second major gangster profiled by Friedman is Evsei Agron, Brighton Beach's first don. A resident of Leningrad, now known again as St. Petersburg, Agron left the Soviet Union in 1971, ran a prostitution and gambling racket in Hamburg, and entered the United States in 1975, one of 5,200 Soviet Jewish immigrants permitted to do so.

In Brighton Beach, he was head of an extortion ring that terrorized the Russian émigré community. An avid networker, he allied himself with the Genovese crime family and with Ronald Greenwald, an Orthodox Jew who had campaigned for Richard Nixon in the 1972 presidential election and who had worked for the commodity trader/fugitive Marc Rich, whom Bill Clinton pardoned recently.

Agron's nemesis, Marat Balagula, was born in 1943 in Orenburg. He was the son of a Red Army officer whose armoured unit stormed Berlin in the final days of World War II. A mathematics teacher, Balagula turned his talents to the flourishing black market in the Ukraine.

Anti-Semitism was not a factor in his decision to emigrate. "I used that as an excuse when I applied for my visa," he told Friedman. In fact, Balagula had his eyes set on the capitalist riches of the West.

After toiling as a textile cutter in a Manhattan factory, he began working for Agron. Balagula convinced him that they should focus on white-collar crime, and they did, to their mutual advantage.

Balagula amassed a fortune in commodity trading, but his success as a gasoline bootlegger was far more striking. Joining forces with the Nayfeld brothers, Boris and Benjamin, he created a vertically-integrated empire of ocean-going vessels, terminals, a fleet of trucks, truck stops and more than 100 gas stations.

According to Friedman, Balagula set up a global money laundering operation based in Sierra Leone. His main contact in that impoverished African nation was Shabtai Kalmanovich. Originally from the Soviet Union, he was arrested in Israel in 1988, convicted of being a KGB spy.

Monya Elson

Ludwig (Tarzan) Fainberg, a native of Odessa, is one of the most ruthless figures in Red Mafiya. After leaving Israel in 1980, he found himself in East Berlin. There, under the nose of a repressive totalitarian regime, he specialized in credit card fraud and counterfeiting.

Later, in Miami, he reinvented himself as the ringleader of the South Florida Russian mafia. In a nervy, incredible scheme, he tried to sell a Russian military submarine to Colombian narcotraffickers.

Fainberg also ripped off organizations raising funds for Israel.

With understandable indignation, Friedman blasts Russian mobsters for having exploited Israel's Law of Return. "There is not a major Russian organized crime figure who we are tracking who does not also carry an Israeli passport," a U.S. State Department official is quoted as saying.

Some of the Russian mobsters are not even Jewish. In the mid-1990s, an Israeli police sting busted an Interior Ministry functionary who had accepted bribes in exchange for dozens of passports.

Quoting an Israeli intelligence official, Friedman claims that Russian criminals have infiltrated Israel's business, financial and political communities.

Such is the damage that they have wrought in Israel.

Kaminker reunion

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

About 220 relatives of the Kaminker family, all descended from a common ancestor born about 1806 in Pomuran, Galicia, are preparing to come together for a four-day reunion this weekend in Toronto. Participants are coming from Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Los Angeles, Dallas and other American cities, as well as from Argentina, France, Ukraine and Israel.

Undoubtedly, the most famous name on the family tree is that of Simone Signoret (1921-1985), the acclaimed French actress whose real name was Kaminker and who was married to actor Yves Montand.

Another distinguished family personage is Alberto Jaime Kaminker, an Argentinian diplomat stationed in Paris who often looks in phone books for Kaminkers when he travels. He arrived here last week to experience a sequel to the much smaller gathering he hosted in Buenos Aires two years ago. Thanks to the Internet, the family tree has been growing almost exponentially.

Alberto, one of several Kaminker genealogists, says his research gained serious momentum "20 years ago, the moment I met a cousin of Simone Signoret's in Geneva." Three years ago, he helped arrange a family expedition to several ancestral villages in Ukraine.

The Toronto branch of the family was established when Avraham Kaminker landed here in 1901. "He collected scrap for a few years, then rented houses and taught Hebrew," said his grandson, David Kaminker, a consulting engineer. Other cousins settled here but the branches lost contact; some moved to Buffalo during the Depression. "Even in Toronto, I've met about 30 relatives that I never knew we had," David said.

His father, the late Ben Kaminker, was an architect who designed the Hospital for Sick Children and an addition to the original Mount Sinai Hospital on Yorkville Avenue. He was also a president of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

The surname may have derived "from the Polish word for stone," David said. "It might have referred to a stone mason or something like that. There's also a town called Kamink, so a Kaminker is a person who came from Kamink. Those are the two theories."

Ron Kaminker, a 39-year-old financial analyst in Los Angeles, has found many cousins using random Internet searches and databases on the JewishGen Web site (www.jewishgen.org). He once discovered a previously unknown family branch and added 80 new relatives to the family tree in only four hours. But he says a great aunt, Mary Glass, deserves the greatest credit because she interviewed an elderly relative 30 years ago and recorded many details that would otherwise have been lost.

In 1998, Ron visited a new-found cousin in Sweden, an elderly Holocaust survivor who thought her entire family had perished.

"It was the first contact with a Kaminker she'd had in 60 years, since probably before the war," he said. "She was crying and bawling when she met me, even though I was a total stranger. It was incredibly moving."

It is a curious misnomer to call the proposed gathering a "reunion" since most of the participants have never met each other before. But that's what makes it exciting for Ron and others who expect to learn something about themselves when they meet their new relatives.

David and his wife, Sandra, have already learned a great deal about his family just in organizing the event.

"I found out one thing," he said. "The Kaminkers are not very organized people. We gave them deadlines to register but I don't think they read their mail."

Typical for such gatherings, the organizers have printed a family chart for posting in the hotel conference room. Stretching 33 feet across in width, it goes back seven generations and shows more than 1,000 relatives. In another three years, Alberto said, it may be twice as big again.

Everyday miracles

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

One of my favourite pleasures is standing under a chupah facing a bride and groom. In late summer, especially, this thankfully happens quite often. In their dreamy eyes, in their giddy smiles, are echoes of the tomorrow of our people, another couple, a Jewish home, and the promise of Jewish children.

Traditionally, every ceremony concludes with the breaking of a glass, a custom whose purpose is to set our focus even at this joyous time on Jerusalem and the Temple.

Recently, shattered glass, shattered bones, and indeed, shattered lives have forced us to focus on Jerusalem and Israel. The news of bombings is unbearable. The pain in human suffering that they cause are unimaginable. Most recently, the bombing of the Sbarro restaurant in Jerusalem left a young man reciting Kaddish for his mother, father, two sisters and a little brother all at once. Perhaps not since the Holocaust has our people experienced such multiple bereavement in one family.

Like our own children, Israeli children attend camps where they sing and play, swim and socialize. Palestinian children also attend summer camp, only there they are taught to sing patriotic songs glorifying war and struggle and are shown gruesome video footage of previous suicide bombers. In this madness, Palestinians inculcate the impressionable minds of their children. Is it any surprise, then, that these very children who throw their rocks with zeal graduate to packing their bodies with explosives?

While our media diligently report these bombings, news of near bombings, catastrophes averted and miraculous escapes don't make the Western press. For every single and tragic instance, there are many others in which tragedy is averted that we don't hear about. These include the bombs whose timing devices malfunction, the bombs whose detonating mechanisms are misprogrammed, all the bombs that kill their bombers without killing any of their intended victims. There are also the bombs that are found and detonated, the missions that are intercepted.

Finding himself totally unworthy of paradise, one suicide bomber had a last-minute change of mind and could not detonate himself and kill scores of others: Heaven can wait! Just prior to the latest Jerusalem bombing, a man ascended an overcrowded bus. No one will accuse Israeli bus drivers of being overly genteel, but physically pushing a fare out of the bus and wrestling him to the ground! The bus driver instinctively knew, and reasoned that better he alone should die with the bomber rather than all his passengers should die as well.

Even in Sbarro, there was the man who sat down to his meal and then decided to run across the street for a newspaper. And there was the impertinent child who demanded to stand by the counter and watch the preparation of the food, thereby saving herself and her mother.

In the Haifa cafe, it was a diligent waitress who could only point with one hand and hold her other over her shrilling mouth that alerted all. Everyone headed for the hills even before the terrorist could say, "Allah akbar." In Tel Aviv, an assassin armed with an automatic weapon shot away for over three minutes indiscriminately before he was subdued; no one was killed. Two staff sergeants in Gaza got into their jeep and turned on the ignition, but the vehicle had been tampered with and the explosion lifted it off the ground. The very dazed but totally unharmed sergeants hit the ground, and soldiers immediately converged and burst out into a spontaneous dance around the smouldering jeep.

For every tragic woe, there are many more tales of fate. To those involved, none of these fall short of the miraculous. In the words of our daily prayer – al nisecha shebechol yom imanu – we praise You God for all the miracles of every day.

Jewish Life

A bold work by deeply troubled Catholic

Constantine's Sword: The Church and The Jews by James Carroll, Houghton Mifflin Company.

This bold and courageous book denounces the 2000-year-old battle of the Christian church against Judaism, as well as the crisis it has provoked in the author's life as a former Catholic priest.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Carroll succinctly sums up the book's burden and message with these words: "The Catholic Church's ongoing refusal to face honestly and fully the long history of its contempt for Jews is what has made it impossible for the Church to face its own complicity, remote and proximate, in the Holocaust, much less to repent of that contempt, or to renounce it."

In this ambitious work of 750 pages, Carroll recounts the bloody string of events perpetrated over the centuries by Christians against Jews. For him, this chain of sorrow is directly related to church dogma and teachings.

The antagonism of the early church against Judaism became widespread and virulent in the fourth century when Constantine declared Christianity the official state religion of the Roman Empire. Christianity now wielded Constantine's mighty sword of power and authority.

The shadow of the Holocaust falls on virtually every page of Constantine's Sword: The Church and the Jews. Carroll begins with his visit to Auschwitz, referring to the large cross placed there, the establishment of a Catholic nunnery nearby and the recent canonization of Edith Stein as part of an attempt to "Christianize" the Holocaust. The goal, he argues, is "to deny the role of ancient Christian Jew-hatred in preparing the soil for the Holocaust – as if the Nazis were sprung as Teutonic pagans from the primeval forest and not from the heart of Christian Europe." The Nazis were able to define the Jews as the source of pure evil in their midst, he writes, only because they were "building on a structure of the European mind that was firmly in place before Hitler was born."

Carroll has strong admiration for Pope John Paul II and lauds his efforts to repair the relationship between the Church and the Jews. He is especially moved by the Pope's recent visit to the Western Wall in Jerusalem.

"The Church was honouring the Temple it had denigrated," he writes. "It was affirming the presence of the Jewish people at home in Jerusalem. The Pope reversed an ancient current of Jew hatred with that act, and the Church's relationship to Israel, present as well as past, would never be the same."

Yet, the Pope, Carroll insists, hasn't done nearly enough. While the Church is willing to acknowledge the sins of its adherents, it refuses to accept its own responsibility. Moreover, the Pope's desire to canonize reactionary Pope Pius IX, who insisted to the end that Jews be confined to ghettos and be deprived of equal rights, and Pope Pius XII, whose early pact with Hitler was a foundation stone of the Holocaust, are viewed as monstrous errors of judgment.

The author ends his long condemnation of the Church by urging changes in its structure and ideology. He calls for a new reformation and provides the agenda for a Third Vatican Council – a call that will not be easily or quickly answered.

This astonishing work should be read widely for the information it conveys, and for the soul searching of a deeply troubled Catholic and his conviction that his Church can achieve proper moral status only if it confronts its history with unsparing honesty and repentance.

Israeli television

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

With the news from Israel and the Middle East changing by the hour, you may want a break from the reporting of the major news services. Thanks to the Internet, you can watch the same news that Israelis do, right on your computer. Today, television sites for Israeli news and commentary.

In order to watch video on your computer, you will need three things: a fast Internet connection, a fast computer and a great deal of patience. If traffic is particularly heavy, you may be competing with others for a limited number of video signals. Video delivery is still in its relative infancy and even if you have a first-class setup, watching a tiny image on your screen still can't match the quality of a TV signal. But being able to glimpse at TV from half a world away makes it all worthwhile.

Depending on what you choose to watch from Israel (or from elsewhere), you will need to download Windows Media Player [http://windowsmedia.com/download/download.asp], Real program [http://www.real.com/player/], or Quicktime [http://www.apple.com/quicktime/download/]. These programs are all free although you can buy upgraded versions with a few more bells and whistles. I have only used the free versions and have been very satisfied with them. Even if you already have them installed on your computer, it can't hurt to upgrade to the latest version available online.

The best television Web site from Israel belongs to the Israel Broadcasting Authority [http://mabat.iba.org.il/]. You can watch Mabat, the IBA's half-hour prime-time news show [http://mabat.iba.org.il/audio/mabattv.ram]. When you're done, Yoman is a weekly 2-hour current affairs program [http://mabat.iba.org.il/audio/yomantv.ram]. If your Hebrew isn't quite up to following the news, there is a daily 15-minute English-language newscast available [http://mabat.iba.org.il/audio/engnews.ram].

As for the quality of the video signal? Don't throw away your television yet. The signal can be quite slow and jerky. Sometimes the same image will stay onscreen for several seconds. But it's amazing that you can watch these shows on computer at all. And the technology is constantly improving.

Other than the IBA, you can also tune in to Israel's Reshet-TV [http://www.reshet-tv.com/live2.asp]. According to its Web site, Reshet TV offers its signal live on the Internet on Sundays, Wednesdays and Saturdays. I have also had success with Channel 2 News, but when I last tried the site I got no response [www.israelnews2.co.il]. Perhaps you'll fare better.

Some Israeli-based producers offer video on their Web sites. IsraTV calls itself the first international Israeli TV. [http://www.isratv.com/]. Its news page had reports about the recent terrorist attack in Tel Aviv, a feature about Israel winning the European Basketball Championship and a look at the possibility of Belgium arresting Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for crimes against humanity. The site also has sections on religion and culture. Some areas are updated more regularly than others, but I didn't know how often since they weren't dated. The reports are in English, French and Hebrew.

Jerusalem on Line is produced with assistance from the Jewish Agency, the World Zionist Organization, the Jewish National Fund and the Jerusalem Post [http://www.go jerusalem.org]. Their English-language shows are produced weekly and several are archived on their site. You will find stories on Entebbe, the Banias springs in the Golan and a look at the changing roles of women in Israel [http://www.go jerusalem.org/JOL33.rm]. Unlike the other video sites which have "live streaming," you actually download the Jerusalem on Line video file onto your computer. It takes much longer to start watching so you will need patience.

While waiting for the video to download, you can read up on how Israel's television and cable industry has grown from its very humble beginnings [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/facts/culture/elecmed.html]. And you can find links to many of the country's most popular TV and cable stations on Televizia.com [http://ourworld.compuserve.com/homepages/igalelon/televizia.htm]. There are even links to sites for popular Israeli shows like Zo Artzenu, Burganim and Zbeng.

Happy viewing.

USDS puts focus on child-centred teaching

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Lucy Cohen had a vision for United Synagogue Day School (USDS) when she took the helm of the school four years ago.

The director of schools (the position was formerly director of education) at USDS wanted "to focus on the learner more than the subject matter," Cohen said. "As the head of the school, that was part of the vision [for USDS]."

In 1999/2000, the school initiated the Alternative Strategies Project, a pilot project utilizing a child-centred teaching approach that incorporates the philosophy of multiple intelligences and learning styles. This year, grades 4 and 5 students participated.

Cohen said that in the last 15 years, research in brain function and learning theory had resulted in a shift in "what constitutes good pedagogical practice."

Back to School

Educators began to adopt a model of learning based on multiple intelligences theory. Harvard-based professor Howard Gardner put forth the theory of multiple intelligences with strict criteria as to what is considered as an intelligence.

All people have strengths or intelligences, as Gardner calls them, in various areas; he established eight categories of intelligence. For example, people can have highly developed linguistic and/ or logical mathematical, visual-spatial or interpersonal intelligences.

There are multiple ways in which people express their intelligence, and that affects their learning styles, Cohen explained.

"Kids learn in different ways… It's important for teachers to recognize the diversity of learning styles and to develop teaching strategies that support that diversity."

Traditionally, schools tended to teach all the students in the same way, Cohen said.

"The emphasis was on the curriculum and the subject matter being taught. While excellent teachers have always made accommodations for individual students' differences, it was not usual practice to centre the learning activity around the students' needs."

About two years ago, Cohen and Karen Oster, a child development psychologist, began exploring the possibility of making the school "really child-centred," by using alternative learning strategies in the classroom, Cohen said.

They held workshops with school administrators and teachers for their input into the project, and once additional funding was in place, they held information sessions with the parents of Grade 4 students, the project's first participants.

The Alternative Strategies Project is not funded by tuition money, Cohen said. "Our school instituted the Above and Beyond Excellence fund-raising campaign for innovative projects. This gave us the opportunity to try the pilot project."

Grade 4 was selected for the pilot because there is a big gap in expectations between Grades 3 and 4, Cohen said. "There is a heavier emphasis on subject matter [in Grade 4]."

Students with similar learning styles were grouped together in small groups and taught strategies for their particular learning style, she said, adding that the small groups required additional personnel, hence the need for additional funding.

The children were taught about the various learning strategies and to reflect upon their own progress through record-keeping activities, Cohen said.

"Part of the mandate of an educational institution is to help children become independent, life-long learners. They learned about their own learning style and how to utilize strategies that help them learn."

"If you know that you learn best by manipulation and you love putting things together, you're a visual learner," Oster said. "It's very important for you to see the materials that are being used and a demonstration of what you're being asked to do. You're going to learn faster this way."

She said there is a tendency to value the auditory and verbal capabilities learners have.

Children who are very kinesthetic – they excel at gym – have difficulty sitting still; they use their bodies to express themselves, Oster said.

They are the actors and tend to do well when asked to role play, she said.

"In this educational framework, we're always working from the basis of [students'] strengths. We're using their strengths to bridge the areas they find more challenging."

Oster gave an example of how differentiated instruction works in a language arts unit. The students studied the book The Iron Man and "used that book in a variety of different ways," she said.

"Some children built a robot; some of the children interviewed people in their communities about technology and how technology can support our life."

There were many ways to approach the subject and the children may have been involved in one or multiple projects, which reflected their learning styles, Oster said.

"The kids who built the robot may have also done interviewing or a piece for the newspaper on technology."

The Alternative Strategy Project saw more integration between the Judaic and general studies, Oster said.

For example, the study of Tu b'Shvat incorporated a unit on ecology and survival, she said. "The traditional was linked to the here and now."

Surveys were sent out to teachers, students and parents and the feedback was very positive, Cohen said.

"The parents are saying that the kids are happier, more motivated. [The children] are getting an understanding of the concepts that they previous had difficulty with."

Supplementary school changes teaching focus

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Haim Klein knows that the "overwhelming majority" of students enrolled in after-school Hebrew programs don't want to be there.

As principal of Beth Tikvah's supplementary school, however, Klein is implementing a cutting-edge program that he thinks will engage students.

Back to School

"When I arrived here three years ago, one of the things that became obvious to me was that kids don't particularly wish to attend," he says. "After a lot of thought and discussion I decided to change the nature of the system."

Klein explains that for decades, the after-school program, which teaches grades three to seven, was based on giving students a Hebraic education, with a focus on learning to read, write and speak Hebrew.

"It was believed that if one learns Hebrew and [teachers] play up the role of Israel in our lives, a strong Jewish identity could be formed. Learning the language can be contributatory, but given a lack of a Jewish framework, I don't believe this is sufficient," he says.

Klein argues that anything short of immersion will fail to enable children to be fluent, and notes that when graduates of the program go to public high schools, what they learned won't be used or remembered, making their Jewish education irrelevant.

"On the other hand, if you change the focus to a Judaic education, where Hebrew is a language of Judaism rather than a language of communication, and discuss the values and philosophies underpinning Judaism, we can make the experience meaningful and relevant."

Klein says that in the new program, to be implemented this year, students will learn to read Hebrew "to empower them to have basic synagogue skills," but there will also be a focus on understanding the concepts behind the prayers.

"If we want to educate kids, we've got to give them the opportunity to understand what they're asked to participate in [during synagogue]."

Children will be given the chance to air their views, engage in a discussion of complex issues and ultimately, Klein hopes, "develop a world view that includes Judaism as part of the thought process."

The programme is cutting edge, not only because the focus is on interaction rather than memorization, but also because for the first time teachers are going to "departmentalize."

"Students will have a Tanach teacher, another for Jewish values, Jewish history, Jewish lifestyle."

Klein says he's trying to establish the idea that schools should "take the best of teachers and have them teach what they are most talented in. Children can't succeed in a teacher-centred classroom."

Klein says that specialization is a logical concept, but he doesn't believe that the technique is being used to teach elementary-level students anywhere else in North America. Only recently have some public schools begun to employ the technique.

The success of Klein's program will be determined by the students. "Every Tuesday afternoon, all the students will be asked to write in a journal their reactions to the things they learned. Whatever they say is acceptable. We'll be looking for evidence that they understood the concepts," says Klein.

"Their response will give us [teachers] the opportunity to judge to what extent we're succeeding.

"The aim of the entire program is to help students develop the skills necessary to live a Jewish life. Unless we engage them, students will not get a glimpse of what Judaism has to offer them."

Child-centred teaching

Some of the teachers were very enthusiastic, Cohen said. "One of the Judaic studies teachers, a very experienced teacher, said, 'This changed my whole way of educating the child.' It recharged her. She noticed a difference in herself."

"You don't have kids who become bored because you're hooking them," Oster said. "They are initiating the learning. They can take the activity as far as they want to go."

KIDS TURN OUT FOR A GOOD CAUSE: Sephardic Youth Camp directors Esther Buzaglo and Jack Benaim organized a fund-raiser recently to raise money for Jewish Family & Child Service to buy gifts for the Foster Children in Care's Chanukah party. Over 100 people from Petah Tikvah, the synagogue out of which the camp is based, attended, and some $500 will be donated to the cause.

CAMPAIGN 2002
ISRAELNOW
AND FOREVER

Campaign Answers Israel's Call

A critical campaign to answer Israel's urgent appeal for help during this time of crisis was launched by UJA FEDERATION this week.

Campaign 2002 - Israel Now And Forever - which officially began on August 22, is a response to a pressing plea from Israel for financial assistance to ease the burden caused by rapidly escalating security expenditures.

In order to cope with the current crisis, Israel has been forced to re-direct $700 million U.S. from this year's budget. As a result, Israel's most vulnerable populations will be hardest hit by this transfer of funds.

A Surge of Support

Campaign Chairs Michael Bregman and David Koschitzky are among more than 60 community leaders who have stepped forward to be a part of the largest campaign leadership team in UJA FEDERATION history. "We are simply overwhelmed by the number of people who have come forth and committed themselves to making this campaign a success," notes Bregman.

Vice Chairs Harvey Naglie and Carole Sterling, as well as Women's Campaign & Advocacy Chair Lesley Binstock Offman join Bregman and Koschitzky in leading a corps of more than 800 volunteer canvassers who will be asking donors to increase their gifts on behalf of Israel. Additional dollars raised will benefit those most directly affected by government budget cuts in Israel.

Rising to the Challenge

A special Challenge Fund has been established by leading UJA FEDERATION contributors in order to motivate donors to increase their gifts. For every new dollar added to last year's donation, the Challenge Fund will release a matching dollar – multiplying each gift on Israel's behalf.

"Thanks to the enthusiastic participation of our leading donors, the Challenge Fund is inspiring many contributors to increase their gifts," reports Bregman.

"It's one more good reason for people to give as much as possible right now," adds Koschitzky.

Vice-President of IKO Industries Ltd, Koschitzky has always found time for community, both here in Toronto and in Chicago where he lived for several years after earning a MBA from the University of Chicago. Deeply committed to Jewish education, Koschitzky has served as President of Netivot Hatorah Day School, as well as member of UJA FEDERATION'S Board of Jewish Education.

The father of five says he agreed to chair the annual campaign because he feels very strongly about the cause and wants to serve as a good example for his children. "People have been very frustrated and disturbed by events in Israel over the last several months," notes Koschitzky.

"Supporting this campaign is one of the best ways possible for community members to provide direct assistance to the people of Israel during this difficult time."

Bregman, perhaps best known as Chairman of The Second Cup, has also remained active in the Jewish community throughout his successful career. A father of four and Principal of XDL Intervest, a venture capital fund, Bregman's commitments go well beyond the business world to include top leadership positions in Mount Sinai Hospital and UJA FEDERATION.

Having long contemplated what a great opportunity it would be to chair the UJA FEDERATION annual campaign, Bregman was more than happy to be asked to chair during what he calls a "critical time of need."

"I am deeply honoured and touched to be able to take on such an important role in the community," says Bregman. "I'm looking forward to working with an outstanding group of voluteers to demonstrate to the people of Israel that they are not alone."

Standing by Israel

"While our primary goal is to urge donors to increase their gifts, we are also going to be encouraging the entire community to participate in a wide range of events aimed at demonstrating our solidarity with Israel," says Sterling. One such event is an Israel Now And Forever rally being held at Queen's Park at 1:30 p.m. on Sunday, September 23.

"It is more incumbent than ever on each and every Jew living in the Diaspora to band together and show our unified support to those on the front lines," adds Naglie. "We cannot simply watch in horror from afar and do nothing."

"Israel's very existence is at stake," emphasizes Binstock Offman. She reports a large number of women who have already stepped forward to increase their gifts and establish endowments in response to the current crisis.

If you would like to make a Campaign 2002 - Israel Now And Forever - gift or find out more about how you can help Israel through the campaign, please call 416-631-5705.

Dear Friends,

These are difficult days for Israel. Our defense and security expenses are escalating and our economy is severely challenged by the present situation.

Government Ministries, except for those involved in matters relating to national security, are facing serious budgetary restrictions as a consequence of our necessity to earmark emergency funds for defense purposes. These spending constraints may unfortunately affect many social services and programs.

As a result, the Government of Israel has issued an urgent appeal for Jewish Federations across North America, including the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, to reduce the impact of these spending cuts through enhanced annual campaigns. By contributing to the UJA Federation campaign, you will be supporting Israel in a time of crisis.

The Jewish community of Toronto is respected around the world for its devotion to Israel and its sense of responsibility for all Jews in need. We, in Israel, recognize this remarkable characteristic of your community. We know that we can count on you to help us meet our current challenges.

The Jewish people are resilient and determined. With your help, we will emerge from these difficult times stronger than ever before.

Thank you for your solidarity.
Shana Tova to you and your loved ones.

Sincerely,

Ariel Sharon

Detective Mendelson helps keep city safe

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — The character of Toronto's police force has changed dramatically since Detective Mark Mendelson joined 25 years ago, becoming one of about three Jewish officers on the force at that time.

And while the city's police has aggressively recruited minorities, including women, Orientals, Blacks, Natives and Sikhs, there still aren't many Jews on the force.

"I have no idea why this is," says Mendelson, noting that it's important to have a police force that is representative of the community, but in Toronto, "the ratio of Jewish officers to the number of Jews in the population isn't there."

"[I guess] it's not something we looked at historically as a profession," he says, admitting that when he became an officer, his parents "were shocked for a while."

Meanwhile, in older American cities, "like Los Angeles, New York and Philadelphia, there are many Jews in the police force. It's perfectly normal for cops to wear kippahs under their hats, and they don't work Fridays or Saturdays. Some cops are even Orthodox."

Despite being one of the few Jews in the Toronto police, Mendelson insists that in all his time on the force, "I've never encountered any anti-Semitism. Religion was never an issue.

"There's a difference between cracking a joke and being serious about dislike toward a particular group. I've never had anything more than a joke happen to me."

In fact, being Jewish may have helped his career. "In the early '80s I was utilized in undercover work. Drugs were coming in from the Middle East, and I guess it was felt I could understand the subtle nuances of the community."

Jews, he says, aren't immune to drugs, robberies or murders. "Jews are people and they commit the same kinds of crimes as anyone else."

In addition to working for the drug unit, he has also worked in intelligence and hate literature, and is now lead investigator of the homicide squad.

"I'm [probably] the second most senior person here," he says.

Mendelson has no plans to retire, saying that as a result of popular crime shows, it's every cop's dream to be promoted to the homicide squad.

Deciding to stick around no doubt provides comfort and inspiration to Jews who make it onto the force.

"A lot of Jewish officers make a point of calling me when they become an officer because they know I've been around a long time."

While there are still few Jewish officers, Mendelson says "we're certainly going in the right direction. Years ago you never saw Sikh officers and now they're even able wear turbans. Women used to have to wear skirts and weren't allowed to carry guns. Today women are respected [as equals] because it's hard to make it onto the force."

Toronto is a relatively young city compared to some U.S. cities, he says, and "ten years from now I think we'll see a lot more Jewish cops in Toronto [than there are today]."

ישראל, קיץ 2001

השליח הבלגי

בכל מדינה נורמה יש ענף ספורט לאומי שבו עוסקים רוב תושביה וזה בדרך כלל ענף ספורט שנולד באותה מדינה. לכן הקנדים מכורים על הוקי קרח, והאמריקנים ממציאי הבייסבול נאמנים למשחק התפנוק, והאנגלים שמעדיפים בעיטות מרחקים למגרש הכדורגל. או שלא נרגיש רגשי נחיתות, גם לנו הישראלים יש ספורט לאומי. ומי שלא ידע במה מעדיפים הישראלים לעסוק שישב על כיסא כדי שלא יפול: לספורט הלאומי שלנו קוראים ריקודי עם. ומי שלא מאמין יכול לבוא לכרמיאל באמצע יולי, שם נערך כל שנה פסטיבל המחולות הישראלי כאשר את העיר מציפים יותר ממאתים אלף מחוללים בצרורות, בבודדים, בוגנות. וכל כיכר בעיר, כל מגרש טניס או כדורסל הופכים לילה אחרי לילה לרחבות ריקוד ענקיות, בהם נעות אלפי זוגות רגליים בחמישים ויותר וריאציות של הצעד התימני חישן וחטוב. וכל להיט גדול וקטן, כל שיר ציר ויגון, מזרחי או מערבי חופך למחול מקורי חדש. וחמרקידים, שכבר מזמן הפכו לסלבריטאים מבוקשים, נלחמים ביניהם על כל לחן חדש כדי להמציא כוריאוגראפיה שתירשם לזכותם ולצלילים ירקדו החמונים. מסתבר שלכל עיר וכפר או סתם יישוב נידח יש להקת מחול ייצוגית שמדלגת על כל במה, פרקט או אולם ציבורי בכל הזדמנות. גם כל מתנ"ס, מרכז קהילתי או סתם מועדון שכותבי מקיים חוגים לריקודי עם על חשבון משלם המיסים, ולפי המספרים הרשמיים 400,000 ישראלים לוקחים חלק בחוגים, ובעיקר נשים. מה שמביא להחבת הריקודים צעירים מסוג חדש, וחכוונה לגברים, ולאו דווקא צעירים. ויודעי דבר טוענים שאחוז הגירושים בישראל נמצא בעליה לא מעט בזכות הרנסנס שעובר על החוגים למחול. ואני מכיר אישית כמה שמאלנים, וחכוונה לבעלי רגליים שמאליות, שהתחילו לרקוד בתקווה שימצאו בת זוג לחיים. חבל רק שבאולימפיאדות אין תחרויות ריקודי עם, שחרי אילו המחול היה מקצוע אולימפי, קרוב לוודאי שבצורת חמדליות של ישראל היתה מסתיימת בחפי אגד.

Howard Ungerman, Chair of Reena and Frank Simkevitz, Chair of Reena Foundation announce the appointment of Mr. Gary E. Sim as President of Reena Foundation. In this position, Mr. Sim will be responsible for building upon the Foundation's current base of support and expanding its fund raising and marketing programs.

Mr. Sim holds a business degree from the University of Western Ontario and is a Certified Fund Raising Executive. He joins the Reena Foundation with over 20 years of experience in the strategic and detailed components of conducting major campaigns and managing the cultivation and stewardship required for annual giving and planned giving programs.

The Reena Foundation is the fund raising arm of Reena which ensures that funds are available to support Reena's vital programs for people with developmental disabilities in the community.

Reena FOUNDATION

Aging Reena clients present new challenges: exec. director

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sandy Keshen has seen a lot of changes over the past 25 years.

When she became executive director of the then two-year-old Reena Foundation in 1976, the organization was opening its second group home. It had a summer camp, a $200,000 budget, and no government funding.

Today, it is known simply as Reena, while the Reena Foundation refers to its fund-raising arm.

The organization, which serves about 1,000 developmentally disabled people and their families, no longer has a camp but it has 21 houses and a multi-purpose centre in Thornhill, as well as more than $13 million in government funding, representing about 85 percent of its total budget.

"That's been exciting," said Keshen in an interview last month in her spacious second-floor office at Reena's Toby and Henry Battle Centre, reflecting on the variety of programs the organization now offers.

On a personal level, the 63-year-old grandmother of four has been a pioneer of sorts. An original member of the Reena Foundation's board of directors, her professional involvement began when Rabbi Joseph Kelman, Reena's founding chair, asked for her help in obtaining government funding.

With a background in pre-school education and experience working with developmentally delayed preschoolers, Keshen did not even imagine herself working. A woman of her age and background (she immigrated from Russia at age 10) would have been more likely to be a stay-at-home mother, she said.

Her husband Murray is supportive, she noted, adding that it was an adjustment for him when she went back to work and then to OISE to study adult education part-time, balancing those two commitments and life with him and their son and daughter.

Sandy Keshen

Over the past quarter-century, the face of Reena has changed. While it remains a Jewish organization, Reena serves a wider mix of clients of all backgrounds and ages (originally it was formed to meet the needs of developmentally disabled Jewish adults).

Today approximately 60 to 65 percent of Reena's 250 residential and 125 day program clients are Jewish.

But Reena remains strongly committed to its Jewish roots, said Keshen. "We've struggled with it. How do we stay who we are and stay open to people of all faiths and cultures?"

Of Reena's front-line staff, she estimates five percent are Jewish. However, they have "a slew" of Jewish volunteers.

Frankly, she noted, it's hard work and the pay is low. "I admire our front-line staff," said Keshen. "Their resilience is phenomenal. It's an often thankless job."

And while Reena's government funding may sound impressive compared to 25 years ago, cutbacks over the past eight years have affected the staff-client ratio, among other things.

A relatively recent challenge involves dealing with an aging clientele, some of whom need physical care. Reena's Al & Faye Mintz ElderHome, for example, houses 16 clients over age 60. The oldest is 84.

Earlier this summer, Keshen and one of her staff members presented a paper on Aging and Developmental Disability at a gerontology conference in Vancouver.

"We are actively involved in pushing the agenda in Ontario," Keshen told The CJN. "Our population needs to be recognized as a population in need of long-term [health] care services."

Developmentally disabled people age more quickly than others because of medical issues, noted Keshen. "They need more support sooner." Those living with aging parents are considered more urgent cases. Of a central Toronto waiting list, 88 of 2,000 were approved for funding last year.

"That's a shift," said Keshen. "We thought the people who were originally here in 1976 were complex at the time, but they weren't."

Increasingly complex needs are also partly a result of medical advances that save the lives of newborns with more complicated problems, as well as a lack of capacity to institutionalize people, said Keshen. Also, she noted, there has been a significant increase in children with autism.

Other changes include a philosophical shift in the way society perceives and treats the developmentally disabled, Keshen explained. The now-defunct, non-government funded Camp Reena, which was sold because it was not financially viable, is a case in point.

"Over the last while, we're talking about inclusion, of kids with disabilities being part of the community, not segregated into separate camps," said Keshen. She believes, however, there is still a need for some specialized programs.

Integration is also happening in schools. And although a number of local synagogues are involved in outreach, Keshen would "love to see all synagogues ensure that special needs congregants are included in youth groups more."

Students, Tikkun Olam in Honduras and Israel

By MICHELLE LACKIE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A Jewish trip that goes to Honduras and Israel, you say? Where's the connection between these two countries?

The answer: an incredible connection based on tikkun olam – the Jewish tenet of repairing the world.

I am very fortunate to have been able to lead such a trip this summer. International Jewish College Corps (IJCC) brought together 25 American university students and five staff to spend seven weeks doing service around the world.

The trip was part of American Jewish World Service (AJWS), a New York-based, non-profit organization that provides grants of up to $30,000 (US) for subsistence projects to small grassroots organizations throughout the world.

We were divided into two groups – my half went to Honduras, in Central America, and the other half to Ghana, West Africa. It was four weeks of hard physical labour, immense fun, and a dose of reality.

We were welcomed into our home of Santa Rosita, a small village of 90 families that rests on top of a mountain. We settled into our rooms, and on the cement floor, we laid out our sleeping bags on foam mattresses covered by mosquito netting. We quickly began to adapt to the life of bucket showers, no running water, and bedtime at 9 p.m. (There was no electricity either!)

Our goal was to help the Santa Rositans create a water system that would bring running water to each family's home. Right now, they still send their six-year-old children for a half-hour walk, twice a day, up and down the mountain, with old gas cans to get water.

We soon became accustomed to our new routine: Wake up at 6 a.m, have a breakfast of oatmeal or other cereal, meet the villagers for work at 7 a.m., grab a pickaxe or shovel, and head off across the village.

Our workday consisted of digging three-foot-deep ditches, laying pipes, and filling them in. Some days we helped mix cement to build a water tank.

We learned that it was not the size of someone's muscles that counted, but what people could do with them. A 14-year-old boy could pick up a 45-kilogram bag of cement and easily pour it out on the ground, while it took me and a partner to move it an inch. It was harder than any work I've ever done before.

We worked side by side with the Hondurans, as each of the men over 14 had to give two days a week to the water project. Our Spanish was poor, but we managed to communicate.

We took an hour lunch break where we ate delicious vegetarian food made by some of the women of Santa Rosita. I learned that hard physical labour necessitates copious amounts of food to produce enough energy for the day. And finally, 3 p.m. rolled around, and the workday was done.

But, you may still be asking, what is the Jewish connection? Here is where it comes in.

Web site lists scholarships

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – It's not too late to look for a scholarship.

Scholastic awards are given throughout the year and even if one isn't available right now, it's worth planning ahead and becoming knowledgeable about what is available, says Joe Freedman, CEO of www.studentawards.com.

The Toronto-based Web site has a data base of about 50,000 awards, scholarships, bursaries and grants, ranging in value from $100 to $50,000.

About a third of the awards are sponsored by private or not-for-profit organizations. "They're the ones students have had a hard time finding out about," said Freedman. Some of them have not been awarded for several years, he added.

His free on-line service informs students about awards that match their interests, backgrounds and areas of study. Registration involves completing a detailed profile, and students, who are invited to update their profiles to reflect changing interests and circumstances, continue to receive award updates unless they de-register.

They have a choice about allowing their names to be passed on to site sponsors or marketers.

Freedman co-founded the site here in Dec. 1998, and an American office was added earlier this year. There are 30 employees in all, mostly in their 20s (some two decades younger than the founders), who research and update the awards daily.

Tuition increases for 2000-2001 across Canada rose between three and seven percent over the previous year, according to a studentawards.com news release.

The chances of winning an award are higher than one would think, Freedman said.

He became aware of the need for such a service in Canada from his summer student employees at Envirimed, a company specializing in health care consulting and research. In less than three years, almost 350,000 students, from across Canada and elsewhere, have registered.

After all, where else would you find funding to study Turf Grass Agronomy (care of golf courses) or Asian Archeology in the Bronze Age?

Freedman also recalls awards for kayakers, discoverers of comets, and children of employees of specific companies, but he couldn't think of any unusual ones with a Jewish aspect.

"I would say we could use some more awards sponsored by Jewish organizations. The ones I've seen are Jewish studies or exchange programs [with Israeli universities]. We [may be] a bit under-represented."

Students visit Honduras, Israel

We spent much of our time discussing where we were. As Jews commanded in Deuteronomy to open our hands to the poor and needy – and just as people – we struggled every day with questions such as: What were a bunch of young Jews doing living in Honduras for four weeks? What is poverty and what can we do about it? If people are happy with their life, is it still a life of poverty? If children go to school with slightly distended stomachs and no shoes on, but still play ball and skip rope, are they not leading a good life?

Maybe they are, but what about the fact that only six of 30 children continued to Grade 6 last year, and only three of those went on to junior high school? Most families don't have the money for tuition for high school, or if they do, then they don't have enough for the books and clothes. Even if they have the funds for that, there's still the transportation costs to get to school. And even then, who would help on the farm?

The biggest question was: Are they happy in their life? The answer we found: A group of Santa Rositans were asked, "What makes Santa Rosita a special place?" Not one person could come up with a response.

The trip didn't end after four weeks in Honduras, but continued for three weeks in Israel, with the group that had gone to Ghana. Now the 25 participants were exposed to an aspect of Israel they had never seen before.

In addition to a few days of touring at the beginning and end of the trip, we spent a week helping run a day camp for three different groups – Russian orphans; Russian children who spoke some Hebrew and had attended a Jewish day school in Moscow; and new, young immigrants who had no family with them.

The last week was spent painting apartments in Jerusalem for people who were single parents, elderly, or unemployed. It was very disheartening to enter an apartment where an older man was living, with mold and water stains on the walls, a bathtub black with dirt and grime; and the only furniture was a bed. We can just hope that by painting walls white and scrubbing things clean we could help make someone's life happier.

Are you still asking what the connection between Honduras and Israel is? What better way is there to create a group of motivated individuals than to put them into a hands-on situation? Each participant and staff member walked away with a new sense of self, and a heightened awareness of social responsibility.

For more information on IJCC or AJWS, visit their Web site at www.ajws.org, or contact me at Jewish Campus Services at michellelackie@yahoo.com. Next year, it won't just be 25 Americans, but 25 Americans and Canadians!

Israel's civil service said to be a world leader in gender equity

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — For a small country whose very existence spans barely half a century, Israel is a world leader in the area of gender equity in its civil service, says the general supervisor for the Advancement of Women in the Civil Service in Israel.

Rivka Shaked was in Ottawa recently to present a workshop at the International Federation of University Women (IFUW) conference.

Shaked's department, established five years ago, has made great inroads.

Having worked in the Civil Service Commission for 25 years in varous positions, including employee ombudsman, Shaked was chosen to head up the new division when it was established in 1996.

"I am a pioneer, the first to carry the flag" she said. "We have to fight for this norm of equal opportunity, [and] we are succeeding.

"[Recently] I gave a report to the Knesset in which I showed that there was an improvement in the representation of women in the civil service from 1996 to 2000. This has been accomplished with training and networking among the women."

Consequently, Shaked said, "we have very radical legislation in Israel concerning the rights of women and equal opportunities, and we have the most radical [legislation] in the world concerning sexual harassment."

Israel has made great strides in its legislation, but is still lagging behind in enforcement. One of the items Shaked discussed with her counterparts was methods for ensuring that policies are enforced in the civil service.

As department head, Shaked oversees 80 supervisors from every ministry and government agency in Israel, including most of the country's hospitals.

The week-long conference attracted 1,000 women from all around the world, including a delegation of six women from Israel.

Shaked presented a workshop on how to make the prevention of sexual harassment an international norm. The workshop outlined Israel's policies and provided an opportunity for participants to discuss and share ideas.

She also addressed a group of 100 at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre and provided copies of Israel's legislation and other information on her department's progress.

As well, she met with several members of the Canadian public service in order to share ideas and experience. She said that Israel based its legislation on Canada's when it established the new department.

Winnipeg federation increases allocations

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) is taking on new beneficiary organizations this year, for the first time in many years.

"Our taking on new beneficiaries is a reflection of the fact that we have more money to distribute and that there are programs and services being delivered in the community that need our support," says Bob Freedman, the Federation's executive director.

The federation/CJA has approved a little over $1.6 million for 11 community organizations, compared to just over $1.5 million that was available last year. The Grey Academy of Jewish Education remains the largest recipient, receiving $642,000 this year, up from $600,000 last year.

The other major federation beneficiaries are the Jewish Child & Family Service, the Rady Jewish Community Centre, the Jewish Heritage Centre and the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre.

B'nai Brith Camp and Camp Massad were both given 50 percent more this year, and the Aleph Bet Day Care again received funding.

The new beneficiaries are Ohr HaTorah, a three-year-old Orthodox day school housed at the Herzlia Synagogue, the Temple Shalom School, which holds classes evenings and Sundays, and Shalom Residences.

Shalom Residences has been in operation for more than 25 years. Based on Toronto's Reena model, the organization provides group homes and apartments for developmentally disabled Jewish adults. Currently, it has five group homes in north Winnipeg.

Despite some government support, its own fund-raising efforts and a strong volunteer base, Shalom Residences in recent years has been running into some financial shortfall.

"The Shalom Residences had built up a nice little endowment fund," Freedman says, "but interest rates and return on investments aren't what they used to be. We felt that Shalom Residences provides an important service which we should be supporting."

The annual CJA campaign has enjoyed three straight years of increased donations. Before the Asper Jewish Community Campus was built, the campaign stood at about $2.8 million a year. Over the last three years, donations have reached about $3 million, $3.25 million and $3.54 million.

The CJA's goal for 2002 is $4 million. Freedman notes that Winnipeg's campaign is consistently in the top ranks in North America in terms of percentage of donors contributing. As with most such community campaigns, a small number of major donors account for a large portion of the money raised.

Canada's role in the Suez Crisis revealed

Canada's role in the 1956 Suez Crisis was more prominent than many may think, recently released documents indicate.

The department of foreign affairs just released the latest volume in the Documents on Canadian External Relations series, covering the period from January 1956 to June 1957.

Foremost among the subjects discussed in the volume is Canada's policy on the Middle East, particularly its role in the Suez Crisis.

Backgrounder

In July 1956, Egypt nationalized the Suez Canal and Anglo-French-Israeli forces attacked in order to regain control of the canal. The documents draw on material from the foreign affairs department's Top Secret and Confidential files to tell the story of the Suez Crisis from Canada's perspective.

Among other things, they document then prime minister Louis St. Laurent's harsh and unforgiving reaction to the news of the attack and trace the efforts of then external affairs minister Lester B. Pearson to prevent a major war in the Middle East.

For his work in creating the United Nations Emergency Force, heralded as the invention of modern peacekeeping, Pearson was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1957.

Lester B. Pearson

The documents reveal that:

• On May 10, 1956, Pearson met with his American counterpart, John Foster Dulles, during the NATO ministerial meeting in Paris. Dulles explained U.S. difficulties in supplying Israel with fighter aircraft and asked Pearson if Canada could fulfil that role.

• On July 27, 1956, in response to Egyptian president Gamal Nasser's decision to nationalize the Suez Canal, British prime minister Anthony Eden told St. Laurent that "we cannot allow Nasser to get away with this act of expropriation." St. Laurent responded with sympathy, but warned Eden that "the use of force in present circumstances, even as a last resort, will be surrounded by risks and difficulties."

• On Nov. 1, 1956, St. Laurent's cabinet gathered to learn about the conflict in the Middle East. For the first time, Pearson unveiled his proposal to resolve the crisis by implementing an immediate ceasefire and providing "substantial police forces stationed on the Israel-Arab borders to keep peace."

• On Nov. 4, 1956, the United Nations General Assembly voted to adopt a Canadian resolution calling on the UN secretary general Dag Hammarskjold to examine the possibility of creating a "police force" for the Middle East. Pearson reported that the "secretary general, who has been very pessimistic this past week, took some hope from the fact that the U.K. had not rejected the resolution out of hand."

• On Nov. 7, 1956, French and British forces agreed to a ceasefire, and the final resolution establishing the UN Emergency Force was adopted by the UN's General Assembly. U.S. president Dwight Eisenhower promptly telephoned St. Laurent to tell him "that he did not know of any government that had acted more admirably in the present crisis than that of Canada."

• On Nov. 12, 1956, Pearson met the Egyptian ambassador to the UN, Omar Loutfi, in the Drake Hotel in New York. Loutfi "astounded" Pearson by declaring that Canadian troops would not be welcomed in Egypt as part of the peacekeeping force. While he wrestled with this, Pearson urged the prime minister to keep it strictly secret, as the reaction in Canada would be "consternation and anger."

• From Dec. 11-14, 1956, Pearson attended the NATO foreign ministers meeting in Paris. Topping the agenda was the poor state of the alliance after the Suez Crisis, and the badly strained relations between Britain, France and the United States. Pearson was not optimistic that the damage could be readily repaired. "I would say," he cabled Ottawa, "that this council session confirmed that the breach between Washington and London and Paris is a serious one… A distrust has arisen between them – both personally and officially – which is going to persist for some time."

• In mid-December 1956, Pearson stopped off in London for a brief visit to discuss Anglo-Canadian relations. The result was a series of long and "embarrassingly frank" discussions with leading members of the British cabinet on Britain and the Suez Crisis. Many of Eden's colleagues expressed "growing doubts of his [Eden's] physical and temperamental suitability to face the problems ahead" and felt he should go.

Selwyn Lloyd, the British foreign minister, categorically denied the British knew of the Israeli invasion plans in advance (unlike the French, who had supported the Israelis), and said that London's real fear was that Israel would attack Jordan instead. The British would then have to intervene alongside Nasser's Egyptian army since both Egypt and Britain were allied with Jordan. Pearson found it "strange and a shade unhealthy" that Eden's colleagues were so willing to discuss his condition with a member "of another government." The exception, Pearson said, was Harold Macmillian [who succeeded Eden following the latter's resignation], who "was more inclined to worry about his own woes" than those of his leader.

A frenzied week on the right

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Events within the various and so-called "right-wing" camps over the last few days could snatch the breath away from even the most grizzled of politicos. The frenzy raised so much dust, it seems hard to tell the predators from the victims, the winners from the losers.

Stephen Harper made the first splash by signalling a possible return to politics as a candidate for the Alliance leadership. The only (absolutely) credible member of the original Manning Reform caucus – and the only fluently bilingual one at that – ostensibly left politics out of concern for the welfare of his family and a sense that Ottawa was a sorry and futile place. Of course, the real reason Harper left was his profound disagreement with his leader about the direction and orientation of the Reform Party. On that basis alone, score one for Harper's political prescience!

Preston Manning

Stockwell Day

Joe Clark

Then came the whammy in the National Post from Preston Manning, implicitly indicting his legitimate successor and endorsing the Benedict Arnolds who bolted the Alliance caucus and met last week with Joe Clark and some of his fellow Tories at Mount Tremblant.

Immediately after that bombshell, new revelations surfaced suggesting that some of the most distinguished players in the Reform-Alliance camp, including Deb Gray, have been plotting Stockwell Day's demise from the moment he defeated Manning in the leadership race.

In one respect, this almost seals the fate of the Alliance, let alone its besieged leader, as a political force bereft of any credibility. On the other hand, like all political calculations, the "Get Day" gambit has the potential for backfiring. Those close to the scene in Ottawa are sensing a palpable, if subtle shift in the momentum. The mounting evidence of treachery on the part of the Strahl-led rebels, the manifest betrayal of Day on the part of Manning and the duplicity of Joe Clark regarding unity talks paint a very different picture of Day.

Suddenly, people are beginning to ask, what did Day do that warranted this kind of reaction? To be sure, there was a healthy dose of incompetence and indiscretion, but no more so than that which attaches to Jean Chrétien regarding 'Shawinigate' and the APEC Conference.

It remains to be seen how a possible Harper candidacy would impact on the equation. But Manning must surely recognize, given the negative grassroots reaction to his recent intervention, his aspirations to re-claim the right are as futile as Clark's delusional vision of himself as the messiah who will lead a reconciled conservative family back to the promised land.

Colombia's 'Iron Lady' urges Canadians to care about her country

By ESTELLE MELZER
Special to The CJN

Feature

In Colombia, Fanny Kertzman is known as the Iron Lady, but at the Israeli Embassy's Yom Ha'atzmaut reception, Kertzman, Colombia's Ambassador to Canada, was asked for proof of age before being served a drink.

Slim, dark-haired and attractive, Kertzman, at 41, does look young enough to be mistaken for an adolescent. Her appearance, however, belies her sharp intellect, steely resolve, and no-nonsense temperament – qualities that have contributed to her remarkable achievements and catapulted her into political prominence in her native Colombia. Kertzman is the Republic of Colombia's first Jewish ambassador to a country other than Israel.

While this is an interesting fact on a personal level, it is clear that her religious background was not, in any way, a factor in her ambassadorial appointment. Kertzman is one of Colombia's most respected economists and trade experts. Before being appointed ambassador to Canada, she was a highly effective member of the government of President Andres Pastrana, who was elected in 1998.

While still in her 30s, she was appointed director general of the Department of National Tax and Customs (DIAN) in the Ministry of Finance and launched an all-out war against contraband and tax evasion.

"Contraband was almost an accepted practice," Kertzman says. "We made it a crime."

She worked with the United States and the United Kingdom on an anti-contraband diplomatic offensive which included extensive money laundering investigations. She also brought in sweeping tax reforms which resulted in the collection of $1 billion US additional revenues annually. Asked how she achieved this, she says simply, "We got rid of privileges through political ties and got more people paying taxes."

No one likes paying taxes, but they will accept them if they feel that tax laws are fair and are being administered even-handedly. After her tax reform bill was approved by Congress, Kertzman launched the most ambitious advertising campaign in the history of DIAN, transforming the department's image and resulting in the collection of an additional $500 million US. She left office with a 67 percent approval rating, second only to the minister of finance.

Fanny Kertzman

Kertzman has been confounding the odds and winning superlative reviews throughout her life. Born and raised in Medellin, she is the daughter of Jewish immigrants from Romania, who came to Colombia in 1936.

The Jewish community of Colombia is very small. Numbering 20,000 at its peak, it is now 5,000 in a country with a population of almost 40 million. Most Jews came from Europe in the 1920s and '30s, seeking economic opportunity or escaping from anti-Semitism.

"They ended up in Colombia," Kertzman says, "because it was very difficult to get into the United States or Canada."

Canada's loss was Colombia's gain. Savvy and hard-working, these Jewish immigrants contributed enormously to the country's development, going into textiles, shoe manufacturing and the chemical industry. Many large fortunes were started by Jews who worked as door-to-door pedlars, building up capital by selling on credit and returning weekly to collect payments. (In the community they were called semanalchicks, a play on the word semana, meaning "week.")

In the 1980s, Jews began leaving Colombia, partly for security reasons (violence and kidnapping are endemic), and partly because of the depressed economy.

"Those with money went to Miami; those without went to Israel," Kertzman says.

Kertzman opted to stay. She earned a degree in economics from Los Andes University in Bogota and, like her parents and grandparents before her, put her entrepreneurial skills to work developing her country. Asked whether this was an unusual role for a woman, she responded that more women participate in government and finance in Colombia than in Canada.

She began as an investigator for a financial think-tank, doing research on unemployment and problems facing the commercial sector. She branched into journalism, writing on economic affairs, and in 1993, co-founded Dinero (money), an economic and financial magazine.

Under her leadership as director and editor, Dinero rapidly became the foremost business journal in Colombia. Kertzman later sold her partnership in the publication, then co-founded, developed and sold another business journal, La Nota.

Violence in Colombia not a civil war: Kertzman

In 1998, she worked as fund-raiser on the campaign of Andres Pastrana. When he won the election, she was asked to put her economic and business theories into practice by joining the government.

As Colombia's ambassador to Canada, Kertzman feels her mission is to make Canadians understand why they should care about Colombia.

"I hope that Canada realizes that there is a violent conflict five hours by air from Toronto which has the potential to disrupt the stability of the whole region," she says.

Kertzman refuses to call the violence in Colombia between the guerrillas and the illegal self-defence groups a civil war.

"Most of the people do not support either side in the conflict – only two percent of the population support the guerrillas," she says.

Nevertheless, the violence has been going on for 40 years. As a teen living in Medellin, Kertzman remembers that she was not allowed to go to shopping malls because of the bombings.

Today, much of the violence on both sides is fueled by the drug trade.

Kertzman is well aware that most Canadians think of drugs when they think of Colombia. Asked why the drug trade has gained such a stranglehold on the country, Kertzman ponders and then responds.

"In a way, our natural advantages have become our curse," she says. "We have two coastal regions, the Atlantic and the Caribbean, with fertile soil ideal for the growing of coca. Crops grow three times bigger there than normal. We also have a very entrepreneurial population and a weak judicial system. The demand is there, in the United States, Canada and Europe, and Colombia responded to that demand.

"At first, both the government and society somewhat accepted the drug trade. Drug producers became very powerful and wealthy and politicians were corrupted. Now our society realizes how destructive the drug trade is but combating it is a major struggle."

Kertzman speaks proudly of Plan Colombia, President Pastrana's strategy for national renewal, which has a strong anti-drug-trafficking component.

The first component of Plan Colombia, however, is to promote overall economic growth and employment through expanded international trade and foreign investment.

"Canada can play a role by opening its markets to free trade," Kertzman says. "Colombia has an unemployment rate of 18 percent, the highest in Latin America. More trade means more people working and more tax revenue for health and education."

Kertzman, who attended the Summit of the Americas in Quebec City, has no patience for anti-FTAA protestors.

"We are the elected representatives of our government," she points out. She feels the demonstrators did not represent her people and their needs.

"There were no Latin faces in the crowd. Here in Canada, you have everything. Colombia needs this trade to give our people more."

Kertzman has personally experienced the toll that violence and an unstable economy have taken on Colombia's Jewish community. Jews settled mainly in four major cities: Bogota, Cali, Medellin and Baranquilla, all of which had synagogues, Jewish schools and JCCs.

Because of the unrest, the community is now in serious decline, and Kertzman feels it will probably disappear soon through assimilation and emigration. After the 1997 recession, many Jewish-owned businesses and factories closed, including the shoe factory where her husband, Enrique Kacew, worked. (He's now studying computer science at Carleton University in Ottawa.)

"Many Jews hired each other, so the impact was felt throughout the community," Kertzman says.

Virtually all the community's children attend private Jewish schools, but in Medellin, the Jewish school now has only 15 Jewish students. The rest are non-Jews and their fees help support the remnant of the Jewish community, which is very poor.

Kertzman's husband is Jewish (they have two children, Perla, 18, now studying chemistry at Brandeis University, and Pedro, 16, a student at Lisgar Collegiate), despite the trend toward intermarriage and assimilation.

Kertzman's drive to improve the future of her homeland for all its citizens is evident.

"Colombia's democracy – the oldest in Latin America – is at stake," she says. "Canada, with its concern for human rights and its peacekeeping skills, can be a strong partner with us in helping solve Colombia's internal conflict and furthering peace in the Americas."

Legendary Jewish pilot named to hall of fame

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — "I was very honoured by the company I found myself in," said Sydney Shulemson when he learned that he would be among the first group of 12 inducted into Quebec's new Air and Space Hall of Fame.

"It was nice to be among the first," Canada's most decorated Jewish pilot during World War II said during a recent interview.

But, he added, "I was just another Canadian who did his best."

Indeed, Shulemson, a Cote St. Luc resident who was honoured with both the Distinguished Service Order (DSO) and Distinguished Flying Cross (DFC) medals, found himself among some august company indeed.

The other inductees included the late George "Buzz" Beurling, who died during Israel's War of Independence, and Canada's first astronaut, Marc Garneau.

Shulemson, 85, joined the Hall of Fame ranks in June. "I was one of the few live ones," he joked.

Eleven years ago, he married his wife Ella, inheriting stepchildren. It was his first marriage.

Now, when reminiscing about the war years, it is with a mixture of nostalgia, pride and sadness.

Shulemson was a Royal Canadian Air Force (RCAF) flight lieutenant who, for an 18-month period, from mid-1943 until the end of 1944, was in charge of a wing of four squadrons, part of the RCAF's Coastal Command.

It was the squadrons' mission to intercept merchant German ships transporting supplies along the European coast to Germany.

The ships were heavily armed, and Shulemson, along with his comrades, risked their lives every day, flying heavy-duty Beaufighter and Mosquito aircraft close enough to the sea to almost feel the waves slapping against the bottom of their planes.

They also faced anti-aircraft fire that downed far too many of them, fire that came not only from the ships, but from gun batteries on the shore.

Shulemson flew on 49 operational sorties.

Fight still rages over UN conference

The United States, which lobbied hard to expunge such language, was expected to announce early this week whether it would attend the gathering. Observers agree a boycott, or even a low-level delegation from the U.S., would send a strong signal to the UN. However, Washington – as well as Ottawa – is under intense pressure to attend from dozens of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) representing a wide range of interests, including those seeking apologies and restitution arising from the African slave trade.

Canada's position is fluid. "It's better to have us there than not," said Carl Schwenger, a spokesperson for the Foreign Affairs Department. "We're still assessing the results of the prepcom in Geneva, and how that plays out will govern our decision."

An option open to Canada is to send a low-level delegation to Durban, Schwenger said, stressing, however, that "Canada is committed to the process."

"It's a fluid situation and it's getting more and more difficult," said Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy, who will attend the Durban conference along with Manuel Prutschi, CJC's national director of community relations. "This is a global Jewish issue like I've never seen before."

Landy noted that eleventh-hour negotiations between Arab nations, the U.S. State Department and Israel were reported to have tempered the anti-Zionist language with more generic terms. For example, one clause is reported to refer to "the racist practices of an occupying power."

But that sort of semantic hair-splitting doesn't fool Western delegates. "There's a lot worse stuff going on than Zionism-equals-racism," according to Rob Ritter, national director of the Canada-Israel Committee. "There's a lot of insidious code words and nuance."

If any kind of anti-Israel or anti-Semitic language makes it to Durban, Landy believes that "there's a general view things will deteriorate to the point that nothing will be accomplished."

Indeed, observers note a huge irony: Getting bogged down in anti-Zionist language will leave less time to discuss how to combat racism and human rights in general.

None of the contentious clauses were dealt with in negotiation sessions in Geneva, but were "relegated" to informal discussion groups, said Karen Mock, who was at the Geneva prepcom and will attend the UN gathering as national director of the B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights and as chair of a special advisory group to federal multiculturalism minister Hedy Fry.

"Everything is still on the table, and that's a real source of concern," said Mock.

Mock, who also co-chairs the so-called Jewish Caucus that has arisen among several NGOs, helped lead a seven-member Jewish delegation at an Aug. 7 meeting with Mary Robinson, the UN's High Commissioner for Human Rights.

"We let her know how marginalized the Jewish NGOs felt," Mock said. "and there were efforts to silence the Jewish caucus."

Mock said Robinson was sympathetic. "She said she felt the blatant anti-Semitism, and that it troubled her."

Two days later, Robinson issued a statement in which she said it is "understandable that this set of issues will require careful handling right down to the conference itself. We must all be realistic in recognizing this and give ourselves space and time to negotiate the difficult issues involved up to and including the conference."

Robinson was also quoted as saying that stemming an attack on Israel will be a measure of the conference's success: "There is a genuine feeling that this is going to be one of the real breakthroughs in Durban," she reportedly said.

Mock, on behalf of the Jewish Caucus, read aloud a statement in Geneva, in which she refuted the Arab rhetoric.

"Zionism is not racism," she stated. "We are distressed that the aims of the conference are being sullied by an attempt to introduce into conference documents, even indirectly, the discredited notion that Zionism, the national liberation and self-determination movement of the Jewish people, is a form of racism. This language targets Jews worldwide and is painful for us.

"Those who promote this discredited notion now, at the WCAR, act in direct contravention of the legal prohibition against incitement to racial and ethnic hatred. That the discredited notion is being promoted, even indirectly, by some at a world conference dedicated to combating racism and other intolerance is insidious, pernicious, and sad, and will only serve to divert and distort the goals of the WCAR."

Landy dismissed a recent report that quoted a senior South African official as saying the Zionism-is-racism issue will not be on the agenda in Durban.

"It never was on the agenda," Landy remarked. "That's why [the statement] is disingenuous. The situation is still fluid."

Also slated to attend the Durban conference is noted Canadian human rights expert David Matas, whose paper refuting the Zionism-is-racism argument was widely distributed to UN member states and was said to be well-received.

Meantime, Israel's president, Moshe Katsav, has written to 64 heads of state around the world, calling on them to use their "moral and political influence" to prevent the conference from "becoming a campaign of delegitimizing Zionism and the State of Israel."

Make lighthearted cooking a way of life

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When you plan to go on a diet, you plan to deprive yourself of food, says Rose Reisman, cookbook author, newspaper columnist and registered nutritional consultant.

"People need to learn new ways of dealing with food; they need the tools to live a lighthearted lifestyle," says Reisman, who also runs the Rose Reisman Cooking School, and a food and lifestyle coaching program.

Look at your cooking techniques, says Reisman, and learn where the extra fat comes from. "Watch your use of oil. Use non-stick skillets or use a spray bottle to spray a few teaspoons of oil.

"You can use less cheese in a recipe if you use a strong cheddar. Goat and feta cheeses have lots of flavour and lots of punch.

"Learn about the leaner cuts of meat such as chicken breast, and cook lots of fish. These are all simple rules but they are essential."

Most importantly, stop making excuses and take control of your life, says Reisman, who grew up "in a high-fat environment and always had a weight problem."

When she hit her teens, she says, she started reading about food and realized she had to change the way she was eating.

"I developed a passion for food. I loved to cook and I loved to create recipes. My first cookbook, Toronto Dessert Scene, came out 12 years ago."

People often call her, she says, and she realizes they do not know how to shop or how to cook. "I have taken them to restaurants to show them how to make healthy choices, and I have spent two hours with them in a supermarket teaching how them to read labels and how to choose foods.

"Some people don't know that a caesar salad can contain more fat than salmon, a baked potato, vegetables and a small dessert. By giving them this information I am empowering them; I am allowing them to take control.

"You have to leave a meal feeling satisfied, and a meal like that can be very satisfying."

Reisman offers the following recipes:

ROASTED CHICKEN WITH APRICOT ORANGE GLAZE AND COUSCOUS STUFFING

Couscous stuffing is a great dish to accompany other meals. Follow the instructions carefully for the apricot glaze. Glaze half the chicken without added cornstarch, the other half with cornstarch. The extra glaze serves as gravy. Do not stuff chicken until ready to bake; this will avoid bacterial contamination.

3-lb. roasting chicken

Couscous stuffing
1 tbsp. orange juice concentrate, thawed
1 tbsp. chopped fresh coriander or parsley
2 tsp. hoisin sauce
1½ tsp. honey
1 tsp. minced garlic
½ tsp. minced ginger root
1 tsp. sesame oil
1 tsp. vegetable oil
1½ cups chicken stock
1 cup couscous
1 cup chopped snow peas
⅔ cup chopped red onions
½ cup chopped carrots
½ cup chopped dried apricots

Apricot glaze
¾ cup apricot or peach jam
½ cup chicken stock
3 tbsp. orange juice concentrate, thawed
1 tbsp. soya sauce
1 tsp. minced garlic
1 tsp. minced ginger root
1 tbsp. cornstarch
1 cup chicken stock

Stuffing:

In a bowl whisk together orange juice concentrate, coriander, hoisin, honey, garlic, ginger, sesame oil and vegetable oil; set aside. Bring stock to a boil in saucepan; stir in couscous, cover and remove from heat. Let stand for 5 minutes; fluff with a fork. In bowl combine couscous, snow peas, red onions, carrots, dried apricots and orange juice sauce.

Loosely stuff chicken with some of the couscous stuffing. Place on rack in roasting pan sprayed with vegetable spray. Put remaining couscous stuffing in a casserole dish and cover. Set aside.

Glaze:

In bowl, whisk together apricot jam, stock, orange juice concentrate, soya sauce, garlic and ginger. Measure out ½ cup of the glaze; combine with cornstarch and ½ cup of the chicken stock and set aside. Pour remaining ½ cup chicken stock into roasting pan under chicken. Spread some of the remaining apricot glaze (without cornstarch) over chicken; bake for 1 hour, or until juices run clear when leg is pierced at thickest point. Baste chicken with apricot glaze every 15 minutes as it roasts. Put casserole with stuffing in oven for last 30 minutes of roasting time. Let chicken rest for 10 minutes before carving.

Meanwhile, remove juices, if any, from roasting pan and place in saucepan. Add reserved apricot glaze-cornstarch mixture; heat over medium heat for 2 minutes or until slightly thickened. Serve chicken with sauce and stuffing. Remove skin before eating. Serves 4 to 6.

RIB EYE STEAK IN HOISIN MARINADE WITH SAUTEED MUSHROOMS

Wild mushrooms such as oyster or portobello are a highlight to this dish.

Marinade
¼ cup soya sauce
¼ cup hoisin sauce
¼ cup rice wine vinegar
2 tbsp. brown sugar
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 tsp. minced ginger root
1 tsp. minced garlic
1½ lb. rib eye steak
1 tsp. vegetable oil
1 tsp. minced garlic
3 cups sliced mushrooms
¾ cup chopped green onions

In small bowl whisk together soya sauce, hoisin sauce, vinegar, brown sugar, oil, ginger and garlic. Pour over steak and let marinate in refrigerator for 1 hour. Bring to room temperature before cooking.

In large non-stick skillet, heat oil over medium-high heat. Add garlic and mushrooms and cook for 3 minutes or until softened. Add green onions and cook for 1 minute longer. Barbecue or broil steak, basting with some of the marinade, until cooked to desired doneness (approximately 15 minutes). Bring remaining marinade to a boil and simmer for 3 minutes. Serve steak with mushrooms and sauce. Cut the steak across the grain thinly to ensure tenderness. Serves 6.

BET SEFER SOLEL

"And They Shall Teach Them Diligently"

Solel Congregation, a Reform Synagogue, committed to providing opportunities for life long Jewish learning in a vibrant, Egalitarian, and nurturing environment invites inquiries about our school, Bet Sefer Solel, which has been praised by educators in Canada and the U.S. for the success of our innovative system. Our teaching staff is comprised of members, parents who undergo thorough teacher training programs and are assisted by teacher trainees, graduates of our school who voluntarily undertake to continue the tradition of teaching our own.

And it works! 90% of our students continue past their Bar/Bat Mitzvahs to grade 10, many becoming teacher trainees. Our younger students continue to win numerous awards and honours in regional and national contests, while our older youth participate in events in numbers disproportionate to our size. Students are also very active in social causes and have on their own conceived and undertaken creative fund raising efforts, with the membership providing full support to these endeavours.

Enrollment is approximately 250 students in classes from Preschool (3 years old) to Grade 10, Sunday mornings and Tuesday evenings. Various adult education classes are scheduled at these times so that while the children learn, so too can the adults.

Our office would be pleased to provide further information, and our educator, Arliene Botnick, welcomes any opportunity to speak about our school.

Kindergarten & Child Care Combined

Upper Canada Child Care Centres is a growing family of 20 child care facilities throughout York Region and North York. In addition to operating quality, non-profit care for children ages 3 months to 12 years, five of our centres also offer specialized programs which combine junior and senior kindergarten education with a full day child care component. These kindergarten programs run five days per week for the full year. The Curriculum emphasizes language, mathematics, science and technology, personal and social development and the arts.
Educators facilitate the child's growth by providing a rich and stimulating program. Balanced to provide learning opportunities in all educational areas, our program offers carefully planned and monitored learning centres. These concrete experiences promote competency and encourage self esteem.
Some of the many advantages to this program include: low child:adult ratios, no need for bussing from school to daycare, daily contact with teachers and no alternate day schedules.
Extended hours, nutritious lunches and snacks are provided at no extra charge.
Please see our ad for the Upper Canada Kindergarten Program nearest you. For more information on any Upper Canada program, please call our Head Office at (905) 946-1113.

Your child can master math

Does your child have math trouble? Or is he or she so gifted, the standard curriculum is too easy? Or is your young student doing OK, but eager to excel? If you answered yes to any of these questions, call Math Masters. Math Masters offers 1-on-1 tutoring for all levels, primary to OAC. Teaching is linked to the curriculum, and aims at getting far enough ahead to let the slower student keep up, yet give the child who learns faster the needed challenge.

No computers or calculators here. For most purposes, a well-taught mind can match a calculator; and the brain's batteries don't run down. Math Masters students learn basic math along with general study skills, and progress from there, growing more able and more confident.

Every tutor has at least a bachelor's degree in mathematics, and is tested for ability to communicate and get along with students. Your tutor will pay personal attention to your child's strengths and weaknesses.

You may hire a tutor for as long as you want; and hours are flexible, including week nights and weekends. For details call: 416-223-6284.

Crawford Boys: Fine boys wear, in big sizes too

Conveniently located in Lawrence Plaza at Bathurst and Lawrence, Crawford Boys fills a unique niche among Toronto retailers. Rather than stock some boys' clothing along with a majority of infants', girls' or mens' wear, Crawford Boys specializes exclusively in boys' dress and upscale casual clothing.

This targeted focus lets Crawford Boys offer you a level of selection, service and staff expertise that is rare to find. These qualities attract an extensive clientele, not only from the GTA, but as far afield as New York State, Connecticut, Maryland, Illinois, Calgary and Vancouver.

Owner Paul Spiar and staff work from an impressive choice of suits, sport jackets, dress and casual pants, dress and sport shirts, and jerseys, from some of the top designer names: Perry Ellis, Tommy Hilfiger, Givency, Guess and Point Zero, to name a few. And their tie collection, chosen and cut especially for young boys, is one of the most extensive anywhere.

Along with regular sizes of 4-20, Crawford Boys pays special attention to hard to fit husky boys. They carry suits, sport jackets, dress and casual pants, in a variety second to none. In fact, Crawford Boys is so well known for this specialty, that the Toronto Star featured them last February, in an article on the challenge of finding clothes designed for husky children.

Important as selection and variety is, Crawford Boys staff is also a highly valued asset. "The people here with me are incredible," says Spiar. "Being experts in boys' clothing, they're easy-going, friendly, and enjoy dealing with the young boys. They listen to the kids, and let them know we care about what they think and want. Each of us believes that top notch customer service is of the essence; and we always go the extra mile."

Crawford Boys has a pinball machine and basketball net so the kids can play and let off a little steam, to make shopping more fun. All alterations are done on the premises; and standard alteration is free on regular price clothing.

This outstanding blend of specialty retailing, selection and service makes Crawford Boys a winning combination for parents and their sons. Phone 416-782-8137; or toll free 1-877-784-8742.

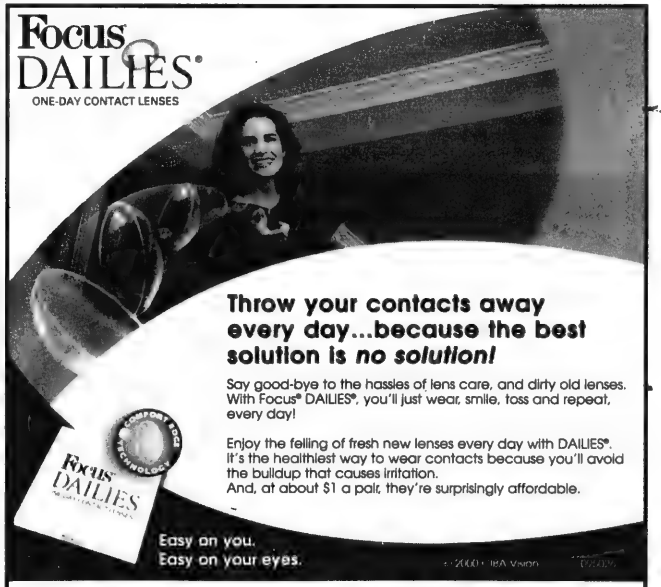
Twenty five years ago - who bought at factories?

Twenty five years ago the Eyeglass Factory opened for business in Thornhill with some simple principals - great prices, superb service, gigantic selection of quality lenses and frames - and reasonable rent. Lorne Kashin owner has been pioneering factory styled savings on Doncaster Ave. at Yonge and Steeles for 25 years. Our factory style rent is still low enough that we can continue to pass on great savings to customers. Our lens fabricators and testing equipment is the newest and most state of the art available. I'm tremendously proud of our service levels and the long term relationships our staff develop with clients.

New, exciting and available at the Eyeglass Factory - is the introduction of FOCUS DAILIES by CIBA. These are wear'em once single use lenses. Eliminated is the use of cleaners and solutions, as well as the obstacles sometimes present with lenses that are not properly cleaned. Drop in to the Eyeglass Factory and see for yourself the simplicity, comfort and the savings that the new CIBA Focus Dailies offers you - all for less than the price of a coffee a day.

Focus DAILIES®
ONE-DAY CONTACT LENSES



Throw your contacts away every day...because the best solution is no solution!

Say good-bye to the hassles of lens care, and dirty old lenses. With Focus® DAILIES®, you'll just wear, smile, toss and repeat, every day!

Enjoy the feeling of fresh new lenses every day with DAILIES®. It's the healthiest way to wear contacts because you'll avoid the buildup that causes irritation.
And, at about $1 a pair, they're surprisingly affordable.

Easy on you.
Easy on your eyes.

Bathroom safety measures are worth the effort

Autonomy can be maintained for many seniors who make the effort to equip their bathrooms with safety features. Take a closer look at your bathroom and consider the following assistive devices: grab bars, new flooring, rubber mats, commode chairs and bath lifts.

The bath: Bath lifts, commode chairs and bath seats can be purchased or rented for increased independence and safety. Back lifts are equipped with adjustable back rests and side supports and they are portable for travel and home use.

A commode bath chair and a handheld shower control can help some people to bathe unassisted in a shower stall. In fact, many of the modern and refurbished seniors residences prefer this method of bath installation for their clientele.

Place non-slip strips or a rubber mat on the bottom of the tub to prevent falls. Grab bars properly installed in the wall studs around the tub help people to get in and out of the bath safely.

The toilet: Consider installing a raised toilet seat, similar to what has been popular for years in commercial washrooms. Install grab bars near the toilet. These are safer to hold on to than a nearby counter or toilet paper holder.

The floor: Remove scatter rugs. Replace flooring with non-slip tiles and avoid high gloss finishes that tend to be slippery. Keep floors free of unnecessary items, such as cleansing containers. Plead with pampered members of the family to hang up their towels and clean up wet or soapy areas of the floor.

For more information, consult the Canadian Association of Occupational Therapists (1-800-434-2268, ext. 242) and ask for a brochure on the subject.

Peres working on ceasefire

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Shimon Peres is in contact with high-level Palestinian officials in an attempt to work out yet another ceasefire, despite the persistence of violence in the region.

This past Sunday, Peres briefed Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on his talks with Palestinian officials and his preparations for a possible meeting with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

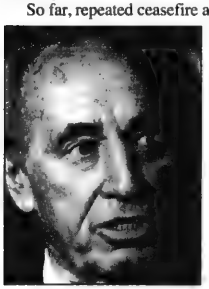
"Such a meeting could take place "in the near future," Peres told Israeli television.

Reuters quoted a Palestinian official as saying that Arafat is "prepared to meet" Peres "whenever he wants."

Peres has come up with a proposal that offers Arafat a staggered ceasefire on an area-by-area basis, with different steps for calming the situation for each zone in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The steps would be introduced gradually until complete quiet is achieved.

The proposal also includes suggestions for lifting Israeli restrictions on the Palestinian population while guarding Israeli security.

So far, repeated ceasefire agreements, including one Peres personally worked out with Arafat last fall, have failed to take hold.



Shimon Peres

Peres' contacts with Palestinian officials have been controversial in Israel, where Sharon has pledged that there will be no negotiations as long as Palestinian violence against Israel continues.

Last week, Peres received permission from Sharon for talks focusing exclusively on arranging a ceasefire, though many observers noted that it would be virtually impossible to prevent such talks from touching on more substantial diplomatic matters as well.

Indeed, the Palestinian official told Reuters that this is the Palestinian understanding.

"We consider these meetings political meetings and not only security meetings. [They] would be a retreat from the Israeli position that they will not talk politics without an end to violence," the official was quoted as saying.

Other Palestinian officials, however, dismissed Peres' desire for talks as a public relations stunt. Ahmed Karia, speaker of the Palestine legislative council and a senior negotiator for Arafat, was quoted by one newspaper as saying no such contacts would take place until Israel withdrew from Palestinian offices it took over in eastern Jerusalem and adjacent Abu Dis in retaliation for a suicide bombing in Jerusalem.

The spiral of Israeli-Palestinian violence continued over the weekend, with tit-for-tat strikes in the Gaza Strip.

Israel Defence Force helicopters rocketed the headquarters of Arafat's elite Force 17 bodyguard unit in Khan Younis after an Israeli civilian was lightly wounded in a Palestinian mortar attack on the community of Neveh Dekalim.

Earlier, Israeli tanks fired shells at Palestinian targets near Khan Younis in retaliation for mortar attacks over the weekend.

In other violence-related news, two Israelis travelling on a bus were wounded when shots were fired at the bus near the Pisgat Ze'ev neighbourhood of Jerusalem.

In Hebron, an Israeli officer was lightly wounded in the leg by Palestinian gunfire. Also, an explosive device detonated beside a bus carrying soldiers in the West Bank. No one was hurt.

Israeli soldiers killed two Palestinians in separate clashes in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. One was killed after troops fired on Palestinians trying to avoid a checkpoint near the city of Nablus in the West Bank, while the second died when Israeli troops returned fire on Palestinians in the Gaza Strip, according to the IDF.

Last Friday, Israeli security forces said they averted a major tragedy when they arrested two Palestinian members of Islamic Jihad in an Israeli Arab town on the border with the West Bank. The two, who were carrying in their car a 22-pound bomb filled with bullets, said they were on their way to attack a disco in Haifa.

In another development, the Centre Party unanimously agreed to accept Sharon's invitation to join the unity government, making this the largest government in Israeli history. In exchange, the party received ministerial posts for leaders Dan Meridor and Roni Milo, and the chairmanship of a senior parliamentary committee.

The party's inclusion gives Sharon some additional breathing room should policy differences lead Peres to pull Labour out of the unity coalition.

At the least, then, the move was seen here as a warning to Peres that if he deviates too far from Sharon's guidelines, he should not consider himself indispensable to the government.

IDF advises against unilateral separation from Palestinians

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Forces is opposed to a unilateral separation between Israel and the Palestinians, believing that this is not the best solution for the current conflict, a senior IDF source told reporters this past weekend.

Rather than unilaterally separate from the Palestinians, the army believes that the government should continue with its current policy. This decision was made following considerable examination of the best strategy for dealing with the conflict.

Assuming that Israel believes the solution to the Palestinian problem lies between the border with Jordan and the Mediterranean Sea, there are three alternatives to current policy:

• Defining the Palestinian Authority as an enemy and declaring war on it.

• Agreeing to the renewal of peace talks to the point when they stopped in Taba and perhaps even under international auspices.

• Unilateral separation.

The IDF believes that this third option is the most problematic from a legal, international point of view, as well as diplomatically, politically and logistically. For example, while there was widespread agreement in Israel when it withdrew from South Lebanon that it was returning to the international border, there is no such consensus in Israel over returning to the Green Line.

The source said that huge investments would probably be needed [to build a fence and fortify] the Green Line area, and that the IDF does not recommend investing such a large amount of money in such a project.

The IDF will demand an extra NIS 2 billion per year from the government, said the source, if the conflict continues.

The army is currently considering extending military service for women to 24 months as part of a wider plan to reduce the burden of reserve duty.

Jews, blacks seek common ground for Durban

BY MICHAEL J. JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — As Jewish activists scramble to block an effort to resurrect the "Zionism is Racism" canard, they also are working to defuse potential problems with the Black community over the issue of slavery reparations.

In the run-up to the UN World Conference Against Racism, slated to begin Aug. 31 in Durban, South Africa, attention has focused on the Arab campaign to single out Israel as a racist state perpetrating a holocaust against the Palestinian people.

In response, pro-Israel advocates have enlisted as many allies as they can find – including America's mainstream Black leadership.

Lost in the shuffle, however, has been the cause celebre of some Black leaders, forcing the UN conference to address the legacy of slavery, even holding the Western powers accountable for their historic role in the slave trade.

That has placed American Jewish activists in an awkward position.

Jews have relied on the Bush administration to lobby against the attempt to denigrate Zionism as racism, as well as other perceived anti-Israel or anti-Semitic wording.

The administration has threatened that if such wording remains on the conference agenda, the United States may boycott the conference and keep Secretary of State Colin Powell at home or send a lower-level delegation of diplomats.

Any of those steps would likely undermine the credibility of any declaration to emerge from Durban.

Indeed, for Powell, America's first Black secretary of state, to attend would be "a prize for the conference," one Jewish activist said.

For that very reason, the U.S. congressional Black leadership insists that Powell attend to deal with the slavery issue, despite the anti-Israel rhetoric.

In exchange for their support for the Jewish cause – and to maintain harmony in occasionally bumpy relations – some Blacks want Jews to stand with them on slavery, which in Durban may include a demand for reparations.

Jewish organization have yet to formulate a position on slavery reparations, and the Black community itself seems divided on the issue.

The Bush administration rejects the call for reparations and has indicated that, if addressed at all, the issue must be tackled on America's own terms, not at an international conference.

Joining the Blacks would force Jews to lock horns with the one ally that has enough sway to make or break the conference.

Moreover, if Washington carries through on its threat to boycott Durban over the denigration of Zionism as racism – known as "Z=R" – there is concern that some Blacks would blame Jews for it. They also might accuse the Bush administration of using Z=R as a smokescreen to duck debate on America's slave-owning past.

Over the past month, anger has built in Congress against the Arab campaign to link Zionism with racism, culminating with a July 26 resolution sponsored by Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) that condemned the direction in which the conference appeared to be headed.

Black politicians reportedly were irritated by what they considered the Jews' single-mindedness and their lack of reciprocity toward Black concerns.

That caught the attention of Rabbi Marc Schneier, president and co-founder of the Foundation for Ethnic Understanding.

Members of the Congressional Black Caucus, Schneier said, were complaining to him that Lantos' resolution was "too one-sided" and did not "refer to the needs and aspirations of Blacks on the issue of slavery.

"We were very, very concerned that our colleagues should in no way interpret that we are being insensitive to their needs," Schneier said.

The solution, he said, was for Jews to better communicate the reasons for their visceral rejection of the proposed language at Durban, while simultaneously expressing some support for Black concerns.

In collaboration with the World Jewish Congress (WJC), Schneier formulated a letter that condemned the language and added that, "We also support the efforts of African American leaders to raise and address important issues surrounding the historic tragedy of slavery and the resulting efforts to seek reparations."

The July 31 letter did not commit the Jewish groups to supporting reparations per se or raising the issue in Durban specifically.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell

Schneier got 28 Jewish and Black members of Congress to sign on, including Lantos and such heavyweights as Rep. Charles Rangel (D-NY); the Congressional Black Caucus Chair, Rep. Eddie Bernice Johnson (D-Texas), and Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr. (D-Ill.)

"The letter clarified that we are in unison, and it spoke to both issues of concern to our communities," Devona Dolliole, spokesperson for the Congressional Black Caucus, told JTA.

In addition, it didn't "cross the red lines" established by the White House, said Elan Steinberg, the WJC executive director.

"We don't operate in a political vacuum and we were aware of the political realities," Steinberg said. "We thought about what we could do to promote both Jewish and Black aspirations without causing harm to our group concerns. We've had our ups and downs over the years; we don't need to have this issue create a new wedge between our two communities."

Though some dismissed Schneier's warning of potential damage to Black-Jewish relations as a bid for media attention, his call also highlights the weight Jewish activists give to the half-century-old alliance between the two communities.

Without fail, Jewish activists note Jews' and Blacks' common history of persecution and their shared fight for civil rights and against prejudice.

Slavery's legacy one day might become another joint cause. Some Black leaders have solicited tips from Jewish activists on how they successfully extracted Holocaust reparations from Europe.

Other Black leaders – primarily from the fringe, activists say – have been less polite, pressing for Jewish support with an approach along the lines of, "You got your reparations for the Holocaust, now it's time to help us."

Jews caution against comparing the two epochs, emphasizing to their Black counterparts the uniqueness of the Nazi genocide against the Jews.

They also say that the Jewish community cannot be out in front on the issue of slavery, ahead even of the Black community itself.

The onus is on Blacks first to formulate a consensus – like Jews did with Holocaust restitution – toward the issue, Jewish activists say.

At this point, Black opinion seems mixed: Some push for monetary restitution, others for "moral" restitution – primarily in the form of an apology – and still others for increased aid to combat AIDS in Africa.

The Jewish activists "are right," said Dolliole. "We as a community need to determine what are the best ways to address the effects of slavery."

Once Blacks themselves have established a communal position, Jewish organizations could determine their take — and may very well follow their lead.

"We don't have a position on every issue, but slavery is certainly an issue to which we are open to discussion," said Jason Isaacson, director of government and international affairs for the American Jewish Committee, who will be attending the UN conference in Durban.

"The Jewish community recognizes the tremendous tragedy and criminality of slavery and is open to a full examination of the ways in which society can address that history," Isaacson said.

Gillon affair continues to occupy Danish media

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

COPENHAGEN — Carmi Gillon spent his first full day on the job as Israel's new ambassador in Denmark last week, getting acquainted with the embassy staff.

But Danish radio has already reported that the ambassador will not be attending an arts festival at the end of the month in Aarhus, where the Bat Sheva dance troupe is performing, because the mayor of the city, which is the country's second-largest, has declared him persona non grata. An Israeli consul will attend in his place.

Gillon will not be attending any formal affairs until he presents his credentials to the queen of Denmark in mid-September.

Gillon faces a difficult task. A television station poll showed that 53 percent of those polled said they had "negative" feelings about the Israeli ambassador. Only 15 percent said they were "positive" about him, and the rest said they had no opinion or refused to comment.

Gillon told embassy staffers that he was not surprised by his initial reception in Copenhagen last Wednesday. Embassy sources also said they had expected the demonstrations that greeted Gillon, and were relieved that they ended as they did, with no untoward incidents and no violence.

But the Danish media continues to deal intensively with the Gillon affair. The journal Politiken made his arrival the main headline of the day. Another paper, carrying the headline, "To Carmi Gillon: an apology in the name of the Danish people" over an open letter, also reported on Denmark's commitment to the UN Committee on Torture. The article said that Denmark would put people charged with committing torture on trial.

Meanwhile, Danish MP Soren Sorengaard said that he will go ahead with his plan to make a formal complaint against Gillon in a local police station, to be followed by a press conference at the parliament building, where the MP will be flanked by victims of torture from various countries.

The controversy over Gillon, a former Shin Bet security service chief, broke out earlier this spring when he told the Danish press that if suicide bombers continue operating against Israelis, Israel may have to resume using "moderate physical pressure," which was banned from Shin Bet interrogations by the High Court of Justice in 1999.

Israel to Arafat: Jerusalem is not Beirut

BY ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

Last Tuesday, Palestinian security forces – supporters of PA Chairman Yasser Arafat – could be seen making efforts to stop the shooting directed at the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Gilo.

Sources in the Prime Minister's Office and the defence establishment said that the Palestinians had crossed a red line in Jerusalem by persistently firing at Gilo and the nearby Tunnels Road.

According to Israeli sources, the public government pronouncements – as well as the personal messages sent to Arafat – made it clear to the Palestinian leader that in crossing this line, he was inviting widescale Israeli action against targets in the territories and against those villages from where the firing came.

It is possible that as a result of these messages and statements, Arafat's people attempted to calm the situation.

Nevertheless, and in spite of these efforts, the security cabinet's decision to immediately and forcefully respond to intensive attacks on Gilo still holds. The decision is an attempt to establish a definitive red line for Palestinian violence, a line which Israel will not permit them to cross.

Israeli analysts say it can be seen as an incontrovertible decision not to permit Arafat to turn Jerusalem into a new Beirut, or a focal point for terrorist acts. Messages in this vein were conveyed to Arafat through various channels, including the Americans.

In the same way as the suicide bomber attack that occurred in the crowded Jerusalem restaurant led to the closing of Orient House and additional Palestinian offices in East Jerusalem and Abu Dis, Israel is now threatening that an escalation in the fighting at Gilo will bring a stepped-up Israeli response that will include air and ground operations.

Senior defence sources have made it clear that Israel's position on this is firm and it will not be deterred by Arab threats or American condemnation.

Last Tuesday's heavy Palestinian fire at Gilo from Beit Jalla was explained as an angry reaction to the IDF action in Jenin the previous night, in which a building belonging to the PA's security forces was destroyed.

The Palestinians also claimed that the IDF had another aim: to save several dozen Palestinians detained there on suspicion of collaborating with Israel. Israeli sources did not respond to this claim.

It is possible that it was against the backdrop of the action in Jenin – after the heavy firing in Jerusalem had continued for several hours – that Arafat ordered his people to take steps to put an end to the shooting at Gilo.

The significance of this instruction is not merely that there are groups among Arafat's people that instigate actions at their own initative and who can cause a serious deterioration in the situation, but also that Arafat – if he so desires – can curb them.

The Week in Israel

August 13

• Hezbollah gunmen in Lebanon have 8,000 rockets, Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said. The Iranian-backed Hezbollah poses a serious threat to Israel's security, he told the Israel-America Chamber of commerce.

• Israel's first astronaut, Ilan Ramon, will blast into orbit on May 23, 2002, the Prime Minister's Office announced.

August 14

• Israel is continuing to facilitate the transfer of food and humanitarian equipment into the PA territories; 459 trucks carrying food and fuel entered Gaza via the Karni crossing, and hundreds of trucks have transported goods to the PA territories through other crossings.

August 15

• Israel received $5 million (US) from Iraq for damages caused during the 1991 Gulf War. The payments were transferred by the United Nations from Arab oil purchases from Iraq.

• Israel's new ambassador to Denmark arrived in Copenhagen under heavy security. Carmi Gillon sparked outrage in some Denmark circles because he admitted to authorizing the torture of Palestinian suspects when he led the domestic security service between 1994 and 1996. (Please see Perspectives.)

August 16

• U.S. President George W. Bush called Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to offer condolences for last week's suicide bombing in Jerusalem.

August 17

• The Centre party will join the government coalition; party chair Dan Meridor will be minister without portfolio responsible for strategic planning and national security, according to a tentative agreement worked out by Meridor and Sharon.

'They've got the story backwards'

According to Reports

"They don't get it. They just don't understand what we're faced with."

That is the frustrated reaction visitors hear from Israelis today, particularly from those in the peace camp, to how the international media have depicted the past year's events in Israel and the territories.

"We offered the Palestinians a way out of this conflict. We offered them a state, but Arafat rejected it. And the media turn around and blame us for aggressions and 'excessive force' when we defend ourselves against the violence and terrorism that have been unleashed against us."

"They've got the story backwards," Israelis say, so effective are the Palestinians in portraying themselves as helpless victims, and so willing are many in the media to go along with this depiction.

Israelis believe that the only time they receive sympathetic treatment is "when our women and children are blown up in restaurants." The sympathy lasts only as long as there is no retaliation; when Israel does strike back, even if "we try as much as possible to avoid innocent casualties, we still get criticized."

Talking about the media, another left-wing activist noted that "along with CNN, the Europeans are the worst. They're hypocritical. They don't understand that the Palestinians don't want to compromise with us; they don't want us here at all!"

These plaintive objections are not mere whining. They capture frankly what one hears on the street about much of the media's inability, or refusal (with noteworthy exceptions in the North American market) to understand the way things really are.

In his excellent two-part series in The CJN, David Margolis has summarized the reasons why Israel's case is not given sufficient hearing in the international community ("Why Israel is losing the media war," Aug. 9, 15). His main point is sound: "David has become Goliath" is the reigning reportorial framework in which many media reports and commentaries continue to be fashioned.

What would help substantial elements of the media to break out of this framework might be a greater variety of viewpoints from the Palestinian community. These voices would explain publicly what is often expressed privately to Israelis: that Arafat passed up a historic opportunity at Camp David, and so unnecessarily led his people, as well as Israelis, to further suffering.

Such an example is Yezid Sayigh, a Palestinian intellectual affiliated with the International Institute of Strategic Studies (IISS) in London who also lives part of the year in the West Bank and Gaza.

In an essential article in the fall issue of the journal Survival, Sayigh argues that "Arafat bears much of the responsibility for this precarious state of affairs" not because he planned the violence, but because he has no strategy all. The violence has proven "counterproductive in the short-term," Sayigh says, to Palestinian interests.

If the Palestinians "have missed the post-Cold War opportunity to make the transition to statehood... Arafat's misjudgment in the autumn of 2000 would be of historic proportions."

For Sayigh, the door to a negotiated two-state solution is not entirely closed. But Arafat, objective assessments would indicate, is not the leader to seize that remaining slim hope.

Writer 'always liked dumb blond character'

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Sari Colt hasn't quit her day job, but with her new book published on the Internet and ideas for radio and television shows in the works, this up-and-coming writer/comedian might be able to do just that in the forseeable future.

"Ultimately I would like to [write and perform] full-time but now I'm going to keep on juggling and balancing as best I can," says Colt, 34, who earned an MBA from York University before joining her father at her family's packaging company.

This balancing act began just two years ago when Colt enrolled in a writing and a comedy workshop at Humber College. After having a few short stories published on the Internet, she came up with the idea for her first book, titled, The Dumb Blond Dick Shunary of Sex, released in May, which she wrote, markets and publicizes on her own.

She says the book is unique because not only is it exclusively available on her Web site (www.thedumbblond.com), which makes her work more accessible to a wider audience, but she says there are no other dumb blond dictionaries written from the perspective of a character.

Sari Colt

"I've always liked the dumb blond character," Colt says of her new e-book, a clever and provocative dictionary written from the perspective of Daisy Macdonald.

"I just started writing and collecting definitions. I went through Maxim [a popular men's magazine], the Internet and other magazines to find interesting words I could play with.

"I kept paper and a pen in the glove compartment [of my car] because you can get an idea anywhere."

In her book, she gives quirky definitions for such words as "g-string" and "erection."

"The point was to make people laugh. I wanted to go as far as I could without going way over the edge."

Despite the sexual theme, Colt says her parents "have been very supportive."

"They were surprised at the type of book [I wanted to write], but my mom even helped me out with the definitions and gave me feedback. My parents are having fun with it. They're very proud of me."

Colt says a strong support network is essential, especially in this field, because "there are set backs and let-downs" on the road to success.

But the bottom line, she says, is that you can't be afraid. "I encourage everyone who has a dream to just go for it. Don't be afraid. What's the worst that can happen?"

Colt says putting a book on the Web was "a challenge" and even Stephen King failed to make the concept a success, "but I set it up as one piece [as opposed to chapter-by-chapter as King did] and it is reasonably priced [at Cdn. $6.95]."

She says the experience of working on "her baby" from start to finish was rewarding and fulfilling and has taught her not to take "no" for an answer.

"It surprised me that I wouldn't admit defeat," she says. "I learned to persevere and to take rejection."

Colt says that attending Associated Day Schools and growing up in a Jewish family, with a father and grandfather who were both entrepreneurs, put her up to the task.

"The structure in my life gave me focus and discipline. It helped me write my book and gave me the determination not to quit."

She says Jewish comedians, such as Jerry Seinfeld (who she met by chance 20 years ago), Gilda Radner, Eugene Levy and Rick Moranis, gave her the inspiration to perform and write. "I was influenced by SCTV, Saturday Night Live and the Tonight Show.

"There's sarcastic humour in being Jewish. It shapes the way you think and encourages you to know that it's okay to laugh. Jews and comedy are a very natural mix."

Colt says she has been getting "favourable comments" about The Dumb Blond... via the Internet and is working on publishing a soft-cover edition of her book.

What is Jewish literature?

By ADAM SOL
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — What makes a short story Jewish? What is Jewish literature?

I recently taught a six-week mini-course at Holy Blossom Temple which concerned itself with those questions.

We read stories by various authors – some Jewish, some not – and tried to parse out what exactly it is we mean when we refer to Jewish literature. We also read a number of writers, from Saul Bellow to Francine Prose, who described what they see as the essence of Jewish literature – Bellow refers to the simultaneous expression of "laughter and trembling," while Prose describes Kafka's Metamorphosis as the story of a "Jewish cockroach."

Given that any prescriptive definition of what Jewish literature is will invite exceptions or challenges to the criteria ad infinitum, all we have is the broken eggshells of an idea rather than the yolk.

But our class decided to throw caution to the wind and see if we could find some common ground between writers as diverse as Grace Paley, Nathan Englander, Franz Kafka and Delmore Schwartz.

The easiest definitions came first: "Jewish literature is written by a Jewish author and contains Jewish content."

This seemed simple enough. But the answer just led us to an even more troubling question: What is Jewish content? Here we ran into trouble, because whenever we tried to define it, the term seemed to slip through our fingers.

Some referred to the essentially Jewish feeling of being an outsider. Others referred to an essential moral stance behind an author's portrayal. Still others joked about the importance of family matters, declaring "public access to private matters" a common trait of Jewish literature.

All of these characteristics seemed useful, but none could be all-encompassing enough to include the variety and richness of Jewish literature.

We could all think of stories that did not fulfil this or that qualification, but still "felt Jewish." And of course we were fully aware that Jewish literature holds no monopoly on being an outsider, having a moral stance, using family as subject matter,or even airing private matters in public.

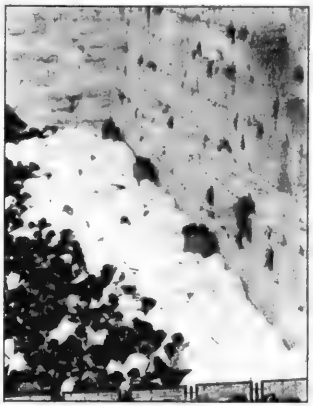
Renowned Israeli photographer opens Toronto studio

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Photographer Jacob El-Baz has a keen eye for the unusual, the sprightly and the poignant.



Haredim pray at the Western Wall.

Using a Nikon camera like an artist's paintbrush, he distills the essence of a situation with a few bold, telling strokes.

El-Baz divides his time between the United States, Canada and Israel. Last week, he opened the Tripod Gallery, located at 212 Avenue Rd. in Toronto.

Palestinian women in East Jerusalem.

A selection of his eclectic photos, going back some 30 odd years, will be on display until the end of this year. The mostly black-and-white photographs attest to his abiding interest in Israel's fate and in haredi life.

El-Baz, 55, was born in Morocco, immigrated to Israel, lived on a kibbutz in the Galilee, broke into photography in his early 20's and moved to Toronto, where he freelanced for The Canadian Jewish News.

Subsequently, he opened an art gallery, sold it and moved to New York City. Then he started a new gallery in the Soho district which still exists.

Now, with the Tripod Gallery, a sunny 1,000-square-foot space in mid-town Toronto, he has come full circle.

The photographs, some 70 in number, are almost evenly divided between Israel and Brooklyn.

One of the most arresting ones, snapped on the heels of a terrorist incident that claimed the lives of Israeli children riding on a school bus near the Lebanese border, shows Israel's defence minister, Moshe Dayan, consoling a distraught father.

In another photo, which conveys a much lighter mood, El-Baz zooms in on a female soldier handing a refreshing popsicle to a male soldier seated in a halftrack.

El Baz's light touch is apparent in two other photos: a toddler, in actuality his son Aviv, looks up curiously at a haredi man praying at the Western Wall in Jerusalem; a woman soldier, taking a break from field duty, grooms herself in front of a mirror.

His forte for cross-cultural juxtaposition is evident in two additional photos. The first is a stunning canvas of two separate groups of haredi men pressed uniformly toward the Western Wall in fervent prayer. The majority are clad in a sea of white tallitot. The rest are dressed in standard-issue black garb.

The second is a stark study of a Palestinian woman in a traditional embroidered dress negotiating a set of steep steps in the Old City. It demonstrates El Baz's skill in handling diffuse light.

A photo of an old Arab man gazing in mock wonderment at a camel with its mouth agape underscores his penchant for humour.

An Israeli soldier grooms herself.

We see haredi boys caught up in the fun of a baseball game.

The insularity of the haredim is underscored by the reaction of a black teenager as a haredi man saunters past him, seemingly oblivious to the world.

El Baz also explores homelessness, and his picture of a down-and-out man sleeping on a New York sidewalk is like a thousand-word essay about poverty and alienation.

A viewer surveying El Baz's ensemble of photos at the Tripod Gallery can only conclude that he is a remarkably talented photographer.

Why Jewish literature matters

Even the easy subjects became confused. Is a pickle inherently Jewish, we joked, so that if Timothy Findley included a pickle in a story, it would qualify as "Jewish literature"?

Very funny. But what about the Holocaust? Isn't Holocaust literature, of all kinds, ultimately Jewish in its content? Is Tadeusz Borowski's terrifying collection of stories, This Way to the Gas, Ladies and Gentlemen, less relevant to Jewish readers simply because its author was a gentile?

And what about other stories with Jewish content which have been written by non-Jews? Isn't Hemingway's portrayal of Robert Cohn in The Sun Also Rises as important a document for students of Jewish culture as J.D. Salinger's The Catcher in the Rye?

What about John Updike's recent novel, Beck, which vividly evokes the type of Jewish character which Updike knows unmistakably well? Are we being unnecessarily particularist when we exclude these fine writers – who may very well know as much about us as we do – from our categories?

We also had trouble when one of our class members referred to a story as having a "Jewish tone" to it. What did that mean?

Some of us – the Americans in particular – could read a story by New Yorker Paley and immediately recognize its Jewish tone, but others thought her no more "Jewish-sounding" than New York Mayor Rudy Guiliani.

We wondered if we avoided some common ideas – Jewish loquaciousness, Jewish accents – because we were afraid of stereotyping ourselves.

On the other hand, maybe we could just include anyone who wrote a book, no matter the content, as long as he had a Jewish mother.

Then we started to wonder: was our debate completely circular, a complete waste of time?

As you've probably guessed by now, our class did not come up with any definitive solutions to the question of what Jewish literature is or is not. There are some writers whom we all could agree on were inherently Jewish: Shalom Aleichem, Henry Roth, and more recently, Allegra Goodman and Nathan Englander.

These are certainly writers worth reading. But I found that when we discussed the more "iffy" Jewish writers, we learned more about what we believe forms the substance and content of our Jewishness – why Paley or Salinger will ring true for some but not for others, why Philip Roth or Mordechai Richler might strike some as quintessentially Jewish, and others as quintessentially anti-Jewish.

In any event, these are some of the most important questions that literature can force us to confront. Literature, particularly that of an ethnic minority, must always be engaged with a search for self-definition.

After all, Jewish literature, whatever it is, is only useful as such if it helps us understand what Jewishness means to us. It seems to me that the members of this class were engaged in a crucial endeavour, one that can only benefit from further discussion and study.

For what is more important for the preservation and dynamism of our faith than a discussion over its essential character?

Passages: Larry Adler, a harmonica virtuoso whose musical partners ranged from George Gershwin to Elton John to classical orchestras, died in London recently at the age of 87, the JTA reports.

Adler composed music for several film scores, including an Oscar-nominated score for the 1953 film Genevieve. Many classical composers wrote music specifically for Adler, including William Walton who once said, "The only two young geniuses in the world are Yehudi Menuhin and Larry Adler."

Adler grew up in Baltimore as the son of observant Russian immigrants. Like many of his generation, he abandoned formal Jewish observance and adopted left-wing politics. He moved to Britain in the 1950s after he was blacklisted during the McCarthy era.

In 1945, he played for concentration camp survivors. "I was playing to these living skeletons when one of them called out, 'Play Mein Shtetle Belz,' a Yiddish folk song. He began to hum and I began to play," Adler recalled. He was also one of the first overseas entertainers to play to Israeli troops during the 1967 Six-Day War.

Kudos for Into The Arms of Strangers

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

It is rare to attend a press screening and witness an ovation at the end of the film. But that is exactly what happened when I first saw Into The Arms of Strangers: Stories of the Kindertransport at the Toronto International Film Festival last year.

It should not be completely surprising that this happened. Into The Arms of Strangers has won many prizes and awards in the past year, including the Academy Award for best feature length documentary.

The film deserves every kudo it has won. It is a moving and fascinating film about a piece of Holocaust history that few people knew about before it was produced.

Into The Arms of Strangers was produced by Deborah Oppenheimer, whose mother was one of the 10,000 children rescued by the kindertransport program. Most of these children were Jewish, and most of them never saw their parents again.

Oppenheimer knew very little about her mother's story. As long as her mother was alive, Deborah Oppenheimer was afraid to pry too much. But after her mother died, Oppenheimer came across a number of letters sent by her grandparents to her mother in England. This sparked her interest and led to the making of this film.

Her major obstacle, as with most filmmakers who decide to make a documentary, was raising the funds to produce the film. But Oppenheimer had the good fortune to also be the executive producer for a very successful television series, The Drew Carey Show, which is produced and distributed by Warner Brothers.

Oppenheimer approached the studio and Warner Brothers agreed to finance the production and distribute the film. The result is a first rate film that really should be seen by as many people as possible.

Its theatrical run was only moderately successful. But now that it is on video, Into The Arms of Strangers will give a lot more people the opportunity to see the film and to appreciate the quality of the final product.

Another video that has just found its way to the video stores is the recent television mini series, Anne Frank. Although it was produced for TV, this was an excellent production that covers the entire period of Anne Frank's life and not just the time that she was in hiding in the attic.

The film explains how the Frank family wound up living in Amsterdam and also follows Anne after she and the others in the attic were arrested. It gives us the entire story, not just the little piece that is covered in her diary.

This film is also much truer to Anne's Jewishness than the 1959 film. This production includes numerous references to her religion and to her feelings about being Jewish and what her intentions were after the war ended. At one point Anne even talks about emigrating to Palestine.

Anne Frank features a terrific cast headed by Hannah Taylor-Gordon in the title role, Brenda Blethyn and Ben Kingsley.

If you didn't see this production of Anne Frank when it was telecast a few months ago, be sure to rent it or purchase it at the video store. It is an excellent addition to the growing library of Holocaust films that has been building up over the past few years.

Trip to Laos opens 'new world'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

ON THE MEKONG RIVER — The low-slung passenger boat carrying 10 inquisitive Western tourists rounds a scenic bend of the meandering Mekong River and chugs toward a white sandy beach adjacent to a jungle clearing.

Towering over us are pristine forests, dense with soaring tropical hardwoods and impenetrable shrubs. In the distance are implacable green mountains.

Under a wan sun, we disembark, gingerly hopping off the gangplank. Half-naked children, their brown faces smudged with grime, approach. Smiling shyly, they seem accustomed to strangers.

We walk into a Hmong hilltribe hamlet, a maze of simple bamboo huts on stilts set amid palm trees. Chickens and piglets run free in the dust.

In a squared-off area, Hmong people wearing traditional tribal costumes, mill around a collection of shiny pots and pans. It is market day. They glance our way, but mainly ignore us.

I feel like an early 19th century European explorer who has just stumbled upon a new world.

Welcome to Laos.

Off-limits to travellers until quite recently, Laos has opened itself to tourism. Convulsed by war and political instability, landlocked Laos, known as the Land of a Million Elephants, has emerged from its troubles and virtual isolation.

Hemmed in by Thailand, Cambodia, Vietnam, Myanmar and China, it epitomizes the spirit of old Indochine. Laos is rural, unpretentious and, best of all, unspoiled. A quiet, rustic backwater whose vistas are balm for the soul, it is a country where time, in certain respects, has stood still.

Caught up in the vortex of Western colonialism and turmoil in neighbouring Vietnam, Laos was continually buffeted by chaos and violence, and hardly knew the meaning of peace. At one point in the 1960s and 1970s, Laos was the most heavily-bombed nation, on a per capita basis, in the history of warfare. But those days are gone, and Laos is slowly developing.

A sparsely-populated land whose citizens could easily fit into a bustling metropolis like Bangkok, Laos imparts the spirit of pre-World War II Southeast Asia.

For the curious and adventurous traveller, Laos offers far more than remote hilltribe hamlets, where native trinkets, handicrafts and textiles can be bought for a song.

Near Ban Houesai, a village across the Mekong River from Thailand, I watched women making rice noodles, the staple of the Laotian cuisine, and men making rice whisky, a formidably potent drink.

After a night in Ban Houesai, a dull burg better left off an itinerary, we squeezed ourselves into speedboats, four to a vessel, and roared off like angry hornets.

Reaching incredibly fast speeds, the vessels whooshed and groaned over the placid surface of the Mekong, one of the world's mightiest rivers. Passing slow-moving barges, we stopped once for a cursory customs check. The inspectors were looking for opium poppies, which, though illegal, is the crop of choice in these untamed parts.

In the afternoon, we arrived in Pak Baeng, a spartan encampment on a bluff. The hostel we repaired to was strictly basic, with hard beds and trickly, cold-water showers.

After breakfast, we piled into a long motorized boat with wooden seats. Then, withdrawing into ourselves, we silently watched the great wilderness float by.

Both banks of the Mekong, a major trade route that connects Laos with China, Vietnam and Cambodia, are clad in thick forest. Hmong settlements cling to hillsides. There are no towns and villages along this lonely stretch of river.

After several hours, we disembarked to explore the mystical Pak Ou caves, a Buddhist shrine famous for its Buddha images.

Then it was on to Lauang Prabang, Laos' former capital. A sleepy, compact town best seen on foot, Luang Prabang, 700 metres above sea level, brims with ornate Buddhist temples where the fragrance of incense mingles with the deep-throated chants of saffron-robed monks.

The royal palace, which is well worth a visit, has been converted into a museum. It is inside a tranquil garden dominated by graceful palms. The palace, with its rich furnishings and bric-a-brac, summons up the pre-1975 era, when Laos was a monarchy.

Luang Prabang's outdoor crafts market, renowned for its embroidered textiles, is close by.

And if you're in need of a soothing therapeutic massage, head over to the Laotian Red Cross.

There is an enchanting waterfall, with natural swimming pools, a half hour away by car from Luang Prabang. It is not to be missed.

The road to Vang Vieng, a backpackers' mecca, winds through a rugged mountain range that supports coffee plantations.

Nestled in an idyllic valley on the east bank of the Nam Song River, Vang Vieng exudes a supremely laidback atmosphere.

The main attractions are the network of caves, bristling with stalagmites, and the superb views of mountains of the gauzy kind found in classic Chinese prints.

There is an abandoned airstrip next to Vang Vieng's scruffy bus station. Built by the Americans seemingly eons ago, it is the only tangible sign of Laos' involvement in the Vietnam war.

Vientiane, the capital of Laos, is basically a steamy, overgrown village that hums to the monotonous drone of thousands of motor scooters.

Its sights include Wat Sisaket, an imposing Buddhist temple; Pha That Luang, a stupendous stupa and Laos' national symbol; and the Victory Arch, which symbolizes the victory of the Pathet Lao revolutionary movement in 1975, a seminal year in modern Laotian history.

A pleasant promenade hugs the curve of the Mekong River, which separates Vientiane from the low-lying Thai city of Nong Khai. The promenade is particularly delightful at sunset, when the sun bathes Vientiane in a magical, golden glow.

Long after you've left Laos, the memory of it sweetly lingers on.

Prevention urged to combat substance abuse in kids

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The effective way to deal with the growing number of children with substance abuse problems is prevention, not merely therapy after the fact, says adolescent counsellor Chezi Goldberg.

Goldberg, a former Torontonian, now lives in the Gush Etzion town of Betar Illit and practises in Jerusalem, specializing in, as he describes it, "adolescents at risk and risky parents."

He advocates meetings between parents, teachers and school administrators, and counsellors.

"Look at students who are in trouble right now. Then look back at what was going on 10 years earlier and what would have helped them," Goldberg said in a recent telephone interview.

For instance, did the child have an undiagnosed learning disability? Is he from a single-parent family, with no one to sit beside him at shul? Was testing too expensive?

Once those issues have been identified, he said, put solutions in place that will deal with the problems before they become a crisis.

Parents should go to their schools and encourage them to learn how to handle problems. Education on such matters as substance abuse, molestation or promiscuity should be added to the curriculum, he advised. "That is the first line of defence."

When a child is actually in crisis, Goldberg said, "that is the worst time to make decisions."

The right thing to do, he said, is to get help from a substance abuse expert, a psychiatrist, a social worker, whoever is knowledgeable about the problem.

"The family is important in dealing with substance abuse," Goldberg said. "They must be involved with other addicts and their families."

For instance, he said, a husband, wife and children might unknowingly be enabling the problem to continue.

Many parents come to Goldberg to "fix their kids. But the kids don't want to be fixed, because they think they know everything," he said.

"A lot comes down to the parents. It is a horrible responsibility – we are watched and imitated all the time."

This is not the same thing as blaming parents whenever a child goes astray, he said; it is just being realistic.

Goldberg had some harsh words to say about those in the Orthodox community who see Israel as a cure-all for youngsters with problems. "They send kids that they know have problems without telling the seminary or wherever he or she is going. Principals do the same thing."

It is their responsibility, then, if the child drags other kids down with him, he charged.

"You don't see the Kotel and become cured – that is not an approach that will work," he said.

The only responsible way to send a child in crisis to Israel is to set up therapy in advance and involve the school he or she is going to. "Otherwise, it is better to keep them here, rather than have them die there and get others involved too."

The Orthodox community, which is just like any other community in having problems with drugs, alcohol, and child abuse and molestation, he said, is still arguing about whether to keep quiet about those issues, or to make them public.

Meanwhile, Goldberg said, people who are known to have these problems, are merely moved from place to place, without getting help, and they then have the opportunity to harm others.

One approach, which he acknowledged is "not a perfect solution, but is more perfect than what goes on now," is under the auspices of Ohel, a New York organization that deals with children with many different kinds of problems. It was suggested by district attorney Charlie Hynes, Goldberg said.

In this plan, he explained, those guilty of substance or abuse offences, can choose to either go to jail, or join an Ohel support group. There are now 16 people in this program, he said.

He can be contacted by e-mail at cheziscorner@msn.com, or by phone in Israel at 972-2-5808-807, ext. 2.

LECTURE ON AGING: Dr. Gordon Winocur, senior scientist at the Rotman Research Institute of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care in Toronto (standing, far right), recently delivered the Rosalee and I.C. About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. Are fast food restaurants making it easier for us to eat healthy foods there?

A. This is an excellent question. Many fast food establishments have added very healthy choices to their repertoire, like grilled chicken sandwiches, salad topped with chicken breast, soup, low-fat wraps and subs, turkey sandwiches, skinny lattes, frozen yogurt, baked potatoes, etc.

However, many of these foods have calorie-laden traps attached, like salads with mounds of cheese, dressing or nuts; subs and sandwiches with mayonnaise; and sugar-filled frozen yogurt.

The other huge trap is in the size of the portions. Just look at the language used to describe fast food these days – giant, mega, biggie, super size, extreme, super, etc.

When a portion is too large, it doesn't matter how healthful the choice, you can still blow it.

Beware. Assess whether the size of the portion in front of you looks "extreme" and if so, decide that you'll only eat half – that will probably be the safest bet.

Winnipeg's art scene changing

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — New things are happening in the Jewish community's arts scene here – the Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble has found a new home, and a young Winnipeg dancer finished well in an international competition.

In a story in The CJN in June, it was reported that Winnipeg's famed Israeli dance troupe had been forced to move from its previous temporary rehearsal venue and was looking for a more permanent studio.

In response, a Jewish businessman, who wishes to remain anonymous, donated his vacant office building to the troupe.

"We finally have a place where we can rehearse whenever we need to," says Chai executive director Tracy Kasner.

"We have two studio rooms and the area is large enough that we will be able to run classes at the same time as rehearsals are going on."

Because the space is now available, Chai will be launching a school for the performing arts after yom tov, with instruction in dance, orchestra and singing.

"As we have become more and more professional, we need more talent," says Kasner. "It has been especially difficult to find musicians of the calibre that we need. With our school, we are hoping to be able to start training singers, dancers and musicians at a younger age."

Chai co-vocal director Arthur Shiffman notes that students as young as eight can take classes at the school.

Fifteen-year-old Lindsay Nelko is making a name for herself in dance.

In late June, the Winnipeg Jewish high school student finished ninth – out of a field of 42 in the junior category – in an international dance competition in Slovenia. She was the only Canadian among the more than 2000 participants in the competition.

Nelko performed a piece to a musical number called Fire and Roses, which was prepared for her by choreographer Sharon Booth.

"She was judged on showmanship, prowess, acting and musicality," says her mother, Shelley Shearer, a former dancer and dance teacher in Winnipeg.

"It was a lot of fun being there. Because Lindsay was the only Canadian, the American contingent adopted her and cheered her on."

The competition was held in Maribor, Slovenia's second largest city. The family stayed at a health spa resort with Turkish baths, pool and whirlpool and Olympic ski runs nearby.

Shearer notes that one of the tourist attractions in Maribor is a restored 15th-century synagogue. "The Jews were expelled centuries ago," she adds.

Back in Winnipeg, Nelko is appearing in Big, the Rainbow Stage production, in a dancing role as both a child and an adult.

In the fall, she will be back to school and dance practice.

Booth has a new piece for Nelko to work on. For her next turn on the international stage, Nelko is looking to the senior competitions in Germany in the fall of 2002.

Braves new world for Jason Marquis

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Legendary broadcaster Vin Scully has just about seen it all in his 52 years calling Dodgers baseball, including the 1965 perfect game thrown by Sandy Koufax. But he couldn't recall seeing a Jewish pitcher face a Jewish batter prior to a recent game in Los Angeles.

It came on May 12 when Jason Marquis made an emergency fill-in start, the first of his young career, that years from now could be remembered as the arrival of another Jewish major league superstar.

The Atlanta Braves right-hander retired Shawn Green in both at bats that night, but what stands out in the bigger picture is that Marquis matched Dodgers ace Kevin Brown through six shutout innings, allowing two hits and one walk, striking out five, while picking up his first major league hit.

Los Angeles prevailed 1-0 on a Gary Sheffield home run in the bottom of the ninth.

Marquis returned to the bullpen following that game, and he's pitched effectively as a reliever since. He was 1-0 with a 3.09 ERA in 32 innings through June 18.

The 22-year-old New Yorker was slated to make his second career start recently versus Florida as the team's fifth starter, taking a turn in the rotation for the injured John Smoltz. Marquis will then get an opportunity to pitch in front of his friends and family at Shea Stadium against the New York Mets.

"He's going to be around hopefully for a long time," said Braves manager Bobby Cox, prior to facing his old Blue Jays club in an inter-league series recently at SkyDome. "He's got a good-looking career in front of him. He throws hard, has an above-average fastball, breaking ball, change-up.

"He's a great athlete. It's just a matter of developing and getting his feet wet."

Marquis, a first-round supplemental draft pick in 1996, grew up in a Conservative Jewish home on Staten Island idolizing Don Mattingly and dreaming of one day playing in Yankee pinstripes. He didn't have any Jewish baseball heroes as a kid.

"At that time, it really wasn't a big thing," said Marquis, whose name is of English descent. "I know Sandy Koufax was Jewish, but he played way before I was born.

"Now, it seems more and more [Jews] are playing and hopefully I can be a role model for those kids growing up."

Marquis attended Hebrew school and celebrated his bar mitzvah before turning his focus primarily to his baseball career. He said one day he'd like to get back into Judaism a little more.

Marquis made his major league debut on June 6, 2000, against the Blue Jays and pitched well in a seven-week relief stint before being sent to the club's Triple-A affiliate in Richmond, Va., at the end of July. He struggled the rest of the season, going 0-3 with a 9.00 ERA in six starts at Richmond, before spending the final month back in Atlanta, where he finished 1-0 with a 5.01 ERA in 15 appearances.

He believes his mechanics were messed up. After reviewing videotape from his high school days and spending seven weeks of winter ball in Puerto Rico, Marquis straightened out his delivery and came to camp with a renewed sense of confidence.

"He has a much better idea of what he wants to do now," said Braves pitching coach Leo Mazzone. "He's using more than just a fastball. He's pitching now instead of trying to overpower people."

Marquis is expected to take a regular turn in the Braves rotation in 2002, at which time he should see a significant increase in his $205,000 salary, just slightly above the major league minimum.

As for that confrontation between the Jewish pitcher and the Jewish batter, Marquis said for him it was really nothing special.

"When I'm on the field, I try to block out everything but the task at hand," he said. "It doesn't matter whether it's a Jewish player or a Latin player, I take the same approach.

"It's nice for little kids of Jewish ancestry to know that there are guys who did make it and not have them be discouraged."

Landsberg's guests 'brawl' verbally

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — As host of The Sports Network's Off the Record, it's Michael Landsberg's job to engage guests in a verbal brawl.

Off air, Landsberg spends much of his spare time raising money for charity – but he wants his good deeds to go unrecognized.

"I realized very early on that recognition spoils people. They get recognized and think they're better than everyone else," says Landsberg, who has hosted two celebrity golf tournaments, raising a combined total of $195,000 for the Hospital for Sick Children.

As well, he hosts events for about 15 different charities over the course of one year. The Leukemia Research Fund of Canada and Parkinson's desease have been two of the recepients of his help.

Having no special personal connection with any of these charities, Landsberg says simply, "It's just so difficult to say 'no'."

But Landsberg's sense of responsibility to the community goes beyond an innate inability to turn down a request for help.

"Obviously [hosting an event] is not anonymous work," he says, but "you've got to look at what you've got and what you bring to the table.

"All of us have skills that relate to a way to make money, and what I have to offer is some profile, some ability to speak in public and some ability to draw on other high-profile people, and I can help raise money in that way."

Even though the sports talk show is a success, drawing in 80,000 to 100,000 viewers five days a week, up from 75,000 one year ago, Landsberg believes he has no more debt to society than anybody else just because he works in television.

"I feel that we all have some kind of debt to society which can be paid off in different ways...All of us have some responsibility to do some good while we're on this planet."

So why does Landsberg feel compelled to champion the causes of various charities?

"I think there's a selfish side to charity, which is that it makes you feel good," he says.

"When you do something nice for somebne you get something in return. That is the feeling that you did something decent, that your day wasn't wasted, that you weren't consumed with 'What's in it for me?' I think that's really important."

Landsberg's infinite supply of energy and his positive attitude seems to have followed him throughout his life.

"I got into broadcasting by having something inside me. I believe all of us have something we're destined to do, and I believe most of the population never figures out what that is," he says. "For me, it was broadcasting. It was talking on TV."

Despite this dream, he says it wasn't until he had tripped and stumbled a few times that he finally fell into the field.

Landsberg attended the Univesity of Toronto for three years, an experience that he says "was a waste of time for me because there was nothing I wanted there."

In his third year, he began at the university's radio station.

"I realized that I may as well take a chance, may as well step out and see, 'Can you do it?'"

He then enrolled in the Radio and Television Arts program at Ryerson University, then a polytechnical institute.

"I studied enormously hard [at Ryerson]," he says, explaining that he channelled all the boredom and frustration he experienced at U of T into the program.

"I took voice lessons every week, and I practised for hours every day. I volunteered at a cable station and worked at the campus radio station," he recalls. "I did everything I could to get better."

Landsberg says his initial feeling, especially as a Jew with no role models in broadcasting, was that he couldn't do it.

But, he says, "the attitude you must have in any field is that somebody's got to get the job. There are jobs out there...That someone might as well be me."

The first day after graduation, Landsberg landed a job at CHFI radio, where he worked until he began on TSN's Sportsdesk when the sports channel was created in 1984.

At that point in his life, he was ready to take a shot at television, although he laughs, saying he looked like a boy of 12. He followed up the description with a high-pitched impersonation of how he thinks he sounded nearly 20 years ago.

"I don't know why they ever put me on the air."

Not only did they put him on the air, but in 1997 they gave him his own show, which he says offers sports fans a different perspective.

ספרותנו

מאת: זהר שביט, הוצאת עם עובד

About Food

Dear Norene

If you love beautifully illustrated cookbooks and if you love entertaining outdoors, Bon Appetit's Outdoor Entertaining (Conde Nast/Panthean, $44.95) is the book for you.

You'll find mix-and-match menus for 175 dishes to enjoy outdoors or indoors, plus creative theme menus and terrific tips. The luscious colour photographs are a visual feast for the eyes. Most of the recipes can be adapted easily to the kosher kitchen.

My cooking buddy, Kathy Guttman, tested the blueberry bars and said, "They were to die for. I used the food processor to make it easier than cutting in the flour the old-fashioned way for the base and topping."

Enjoy!

BLUEBERRY STREUSEL BARS

Crust:
1½ cups old-fashioned oats
1½ cups all-purpose flour
1 cup (packed) golden brown sugar
½ tsp. baking soda
1 cup chilled unsalted butter, cut into small pieces

Filling:
12 oz. package frozen blueberries, thawed
⅔ cup blueberry or raspberry jam
5 tsp. all-purpose flour
1½ tsp. minced lemon peel

Crust: Preheat oven to 375. Generously butter 13 x 9 x 2-inch glass baking dish. Combine first 4 ingredients in medium bowl. Add butter; rub with fingertips until mixture resembles coarse meal. Press half of crumb mixture onto bottom of prepared pan. Bake crust until light brown, about 15 minutes. Cool slightly.

Filling: Mix blueberries, jam, flour and lemon peel in medium bowl. Spread filling over crust. Sprinkle remaining crumb mixture over. Bake until golden, about 35 minutes. Cool in pan. Cut into squares. Makes 24.

Syrian election to Security Council opposed

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The election of Syria to a non-permanent position on the UN Security Council is a virtual fait accompli, but the government of Israel and Jewish community organizations are urging Canada not to back its candidacy.

Canada's support for the election of a dictatorship that flouts human rights – and UN resolutions – would send the wrong message to other countries that violate fundamental freedoms, they say. Instead, Canada should withhold its vote when the election comes up, probably in late October.

Canada has not announced its decision, though Southam News last week quoted unnamed diplomatic sources saying Canada would vote in favour of Syria as part of a strategy of strengthening its relationships with Arab countries.

A spokesman for Foreign Affairs, Michael O'Shaughnessy, said Canada never reveals its voting intentions. In a prepared statement, he pointed out Syria is the only candidate advanced by its electoral group for the Asian seat on the Security Council. "Since there are no other candidates for the Asian seat, there is not an election per se," he said.

"In the fall, the General Assembly will be asked to endorse the Asian group's decision, and thus, Syria is virtually assured of winning the seat," he added.

Canada's position on the Syria vote was applauded by Atif Kubursi, president of the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations. He called it "very positive," Southam reported.

Palestinian gunmen attack IDF base

By PETER HIRSCHBERG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Palestinians claimed a military success Saturday, when two gunmen infiltrated an IDF base in Gaza and killed three soldiers before being killed themselves, but the weekend was less rosy on the diplomatic front.

Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat found his push for UN observers thwarted yet again, and U.S. criticism of his actions held firm.

Furthermore, the Palestinians were hit by an aerial bombardment Sunday morning, when Israeli F-15 and F-16 fighter planes destroyed police installations in the Gaza Strip in retaliation for the killing of the three soldiers and the shooting ambush on the Jerusalem-Modi'in road Saturday night in which two people were killed.

Earlier, IDF ground forces thrust into Palestinian-controlled territory in the Rafah area in southern Gaza, and attacked PA security positions.

Arafat is facing the fact that U.S. criticism of Israeli retaliatory actions has become increasingly muted. President George W. Bush refused to criticize the IDF action in Hebron's Abu Sneina neighbourhood last week, and on Friday, he blamed the Palestinians for paralyzing the peace process, and he backed Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's refusal to negotiate under fire.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Order of Canada

OTTAWA — Several Jewish Canadians were among the 104 new appointments to the Order of Canada announced last week by Governor-General Adrienne Clarkson. Named as officers were Mark Greenberg of Toronto in the field of health care, and Mark Wainberg of Montreal, also for health care. Named as members were Rabbi Erwin Schild of Toronto, rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel Synagogue; Clara Balinsky of Montreal for voluntarism; Marjorie Bronfman of Montreal for philanthropy; lawyer Eric Maldoff of Montreal, a former leader of Alliance Quebec; and Herbert Sibblin of Montreal in the field of business.

Web site moves

TORONTO — A Web site that posted an "invitation to jihad" to recruit potential Islamic terrorists has changed its registered base from Canada to the United States, according to a report in the National Post. The site, www.Islamway.com, is being investigated by the RCMP following complaints that it was seeking recruits for terrorist training in camps in Afghanistan and that it included vicious anti-Semitic statements. A second Canadian Web site, www.qudscall.com, is also being investigated by the RCMP.

ISRAEL

Israel Helps PA

JERUSALEM — Israel is providing food and livestock to help alleviate a Palestinian food shortage in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Israel reportedly is transferring to the Palestinian Authority some 17,000 cattle, calves and sheep. Earlier, 459 trucks with food and fuel reportedly entered Gaza from Israel.

Baby Delivered

JERUSALEM — Israeli border police delivered a Palestinian baby last weekend. The delivery came after officers heard cries coming from a vehicle at a West Bank checkpoint. Mother and baby were reportedly doing well.

Pride Flag Torched

JERUSALEM — Vandals last week attempted to torch a rainbow flag symbolizing the gay pride movement. The incident came on the eve of Mayor Ehud Olmert's first visit to the city's gay community centre. The flag, which flew from the centre's balcony, was partially burnt. A note left behind stated, "God will humiliate those who have pride." It was the third such attack since gay pride events began in June. Police are investigating.

WORLD

Rabbi Pam Dies

NEW YORK — Rabbi Avrohom Pam, one of the most respected voices in the Orthodox Jewish community, died Aug. 17 of cancer. Rabbi Pam, who was 88, was one of eight members of Agudath Israel of America's Council of Torah Sages and longtime dean of Yeshiva Torah Vodaath in Brooklyn.

Rich Questions

WASHINGTON — A U.S. congressional committee has sent former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak a list of questions it wants answered about his role in former president Bill Clinton's controversial pardon of fugitive philanthropist Marc Rich. According to White House notes of conversations between Clinton and Barak, the two leaders discussed the pardon on three occasions.

War Crimes Trial

EDINBURGH — Scotland says it will seek a second opinion on whether a suspected Nazi war criminal can stand trial. A first report on Anton Gecas, 85, accused of participating in the killing of Jews and other civilians in what is now Belarus, found that he is too ill to stand trial. Gecas suffered two strokes earlier this year and has been hospitalized since May.

Rabbi's Trial

TRENTON, N.J. — Jury selection began last week in the New Jersey trial of a rabbi who allegedly arranged his wife's murder. Fred Neulander could face the death penalty if he's convicted in the 1994 death of his wife, Carol.

Russian Arsons

MOSCOW — The Russian Jewish Congress and the Moscow office of the Anti-Defamation League are urging Russian authorities to take action against the increasing number of arsons and other anti-Jewish incidents. Since June, there have been nine cases of arson attempts against synagogues and Jewish schools. The frequency of cemetery desecrations has also risen.

Ontario Grads

NEW YORK — Six Ontario residents were among the recent graduates of Yeshiva University here: Tova Kalkstein, Naomi Ben-Nun, Michael Judah Levy, Mark David Tanenbaum, Danielle S. Erez and Yitzchak Motzen, all from the Toronto area, graduated from three of YU's colleges.

Birthright Boost

NEW YORK — A program that sends young Jews on free trips to Israel plans to send more people this winter than it did last winter, despite significant drops in North American Jewish travel to Israel during the Middle East violence. Birthright Israel has sent 22,000 Jews to Israel on group trips so far.

Bergson Raised Awareness of Holocaust

TEL AVIV — Peter Bergson, who raised awareness of the Holocaust in the United States during the 1940s, died here Aug. 18. He was 86.

Known in Israel as Hillel Kook, his birth and Hebrew name, Bergson was born in Lithuania, and was a member of the Irgun, the armed Jewish underground.

Bergson came to the United States in 1940. Two years later, he began concentrating on increasing awareness of the Holocaust through advertisements, rallies and even plays. In 1943, he co-founded the Emergency Committee to Save the Jews in Europe, spurring the U.S. government to create the War Refugee Board in 1944.

Bergson returned to Palestine in 1948 and was elected to the nascent state's assembly as a member of Menachem Begin's Herut Party. But he later resigned and left the country in protest when Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion's promise of a constitution within one year was not delivered.

'Urgent' campaign launched by UJA Federation

Social services affected by situation in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The message of this year's UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Campaign launch was one of urgency.

Organizers were fuelled in large part by an "extraordinary request" from the government of Israel for assistance, as Miles Nadal, campaign launch co-chair along with Heather Reisman, put it.

The 1,250 community members attending the launch last Wednesday evening at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel received, along with their programs, a copy of a letter from Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon referring to Israel's increased defence and security expenses and their potential effect on social services and programs.

The letter read in part, "[T]he Government of Israel has issued an urgent appeal for Jewish Federations across North America to reduce the impact of these spending cuts [$700 million] through enhanced annual campaigns."

The answer to Israel's current challenges, said Haim Divon, Israel's ambassador to Canada, is a strong Israel and strong Jewish communities.

In addition to the financial challenges, Divon discussed the "disturbing and ugly reality" of the upcoming Durban conference and the expected efforts at delegitimizing Israel, as well as the "bizarre phenomenon" of the expected admittance of Syria – "of all countries" – as a member of the Security Council.

Divon lauded the efforts of keynote speaker Senator George Mitchell – whose May report on ending the violence in the Middle East is the basis for current negotiations – but cautioned that to implement the report's recommendations, Israel has to be strong, lest the changes prove to be a wrong move.

On a brighter note, Israeli singing group Gaya, in its North American debut, had the audience singing and clapping along to upbeat music with a message of peace and strength and a distinct Middle Eastern/North African accent.

Band leader Gili Liber offered his music as "a prayer for better times."

Isolated within a hostile world

From the editor's desk

Yossi Klein Halevi, one of Israel's fine young political and social commentators, recently wrote in The New Republic in an incisive, though painful article entitled State of Despair, that "Oslo tempted us with the promise of [a] rational Middle East... We lowered our guard."

In the article, Halevi records his conversations with Israelis from across the political spectrum. The common theme that courses through his many discussions is the return of the feeling, not too long ago thought to be obsolete, a relic of a lachrymose Jewish past, that Israelis feel once again isolated: isolated within a hostile Middle East, and increasingly, isolated within the wider international community.

It was assumed by everyone who believed the Oslo process was a worthwhile risk, that negotiations with the Palestinian leaders would be long, arduous, difficult, annoying, frustrating, even enraging, at times. But no matter how difficult the impasse, how insulting the name-calling, how jabbing the finger-pointing, there would be no more violence. "No more violence" was the explicit promise, thrice signed and often repeated (albeit in English) before politicians, statesmen, clergy and television crews by Yasser Arafat. Disputes, little or large, would be resolved at the end of a table, not at the end of a gun or bomber's fuse.

But Arafat's promise, alas, turned out to be no promise at all, but a ploy.

His ploy exposed, he has suffered no reproach, no recrimination, no censure in the western world to the shocked incredulity of Israelis and Israel's supporters.

What is worse is that many pundits, journalists and politicians make excuses for Arafat's behaviour.

And what is worse still, those same pundits, journalists and politicians reprove and censure Israel for deciding to actively, even aggressively, defend itself against Arafat's treachery.

It is therefore not surprising, given the rise of this attitude, the attitude that panders to one and punishes the other, that Israelis and Jews too, should once again feel that sense of isolation closing in.

The evidence of this attitude is ubiquitous throughout the Western world. For example, the Palestinian leaders are allowed to prescribe, if not define, the terms of the media's coverage of the conflict.

Unlike any other campaign of terror being waged on earth, Israel must find ways to defend its citizens against suicide bombers. For the suicide bomber, of course, the prospect of death is not a deterrent. He is, truly, in Franz Fanon's terms, one of the "wretched of the earth," embittered by his poverty, abandoned by his political leaders and exploited by the religious teachers who channel, if not inspire, his hatred and send him to his murdering death.

Israel strikes at the men who are known – often by their own boasting – to plan and direct the suicide bombings. The Palestinian leaders protest Israel's policy as one of "assassination" and "extra-territorial executions."

The terminology "assassination" is a clever manipulation. It engenders revulsion against Israel for killing the commanders of the bombers and at the same time, amnesia towards the PA and their Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah henchmen for planning and implementing the bombing.

It is also, of course, an inappropriate use of the term, which is generally used in reference to the killing of a political, non-combatant figure. The leaders who send the bombers to kill women and children in restaurants, coffee houses or discotheques can hardly be considered to be "political." They are military commanders waging war against Israel, even if they are cowardly commanders for never going themselves on the missions of murder and self-destruction. Nor do they ever send their own children on these missions. A pre-emptive strike at a military commander known to be plotting imminent attack against the people of another state is not an assassination. It is a morally and militarily justifiable defence.

By repeating the use of the word "assassination," we are simply walking along the propaganda path laid out by the PA leaders. We must not do so.

But we must, by contrast, point out that the outrages emanating from within the world of Israel's enemies go largely unreported.

Last week, the Globe and Mail placed a tiny two and a half inch "story" alongside a much larger photo of a sad Palestinian woman walking "among the debris of a house allegedly built without a permit and destroyed by Israeli bulldozers." The photo effectively depicted the woman's grief. The story alongside was curiously small given its subject. It should have been farcical but it was too alarming. Its lead paragraph read: "A senior Iraqi official described Jews as 'the sons of monkeys and pigs' at an international conference of 350 Islamic clerics for the destruction of Israel."

No western government was reported as having reacted to – let alone condemned – the sheer, undiluted, toxic hatred dripping from that conference into the minds and hearts of the people living under the regimes represented by the 350 clerics, oppressed by their leaders' policies and made more wretched for the poison they constantly, ignorantly swallow.

Israeli group debuts at campaign launch

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The name says it all. Gaya – the Israeli singing group that made its North American debut last week at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel for the campaign launch of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – was named for Mother Earth, as personified in Greek mythology.

And Gaya's music – in fact, its whole philosophy of life – is all about love, peace and ecology, subjects the five band members, dressed in white for their Toronto gig, were happy to discuss in an interview in their dressing room before taking the stage.

"We want to connect with everyone, no matter their colour, age or race," said Gaya founder Gili Liber, a native of Haifa who studied jazz at the Rimon School of Music.

Their philosophy may be simple, but their music is more complex, combining elements of North Africa, Turkey, the West, the Mediterranean and Israel.

"Goddammit, they were good!" exclaimed one audience member at the end of their set, referring in particular to the work of percussionists Ronen Ziony and Amir Yakobi.

Liber, like his fellow band members, comes mainly from a rock background, although he also played jazz. Then, about eight years ago he began playing ethnic music, using instruments like the darbouka, bouzouki, ney (Arabic flute) and oud.

"I found, in eastern ethnic music, more notes to play, more scales, and I thought it's very interesting." The music, he felt, had potential to enrich his melodies. And playing instruments that didn't involve electricity also offered new possibilities.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

Liber teamed up with Ayelet Zioni, now his wife, and they began writing music together. She is Gaya's producer and they continue to collaborate on music – Zioni writes the lyrics, Liber the melodies. Their most recent collaboration, however, is their one-month-old son Shachar.

Gaya was formed in 1997 when Liber and Zioni decided their songs might have a broader appeal than just their own circle of friends. With two CDs to their credit, the band was described in publicity for their Toronto appearance as "Israel's hottest singing group today."

Current band members, all Israeli-born, range in age from 20 to 38.

In addition to Liber, Ziony and Yakobi, band members include bass guitarist Yishay Gazit and singer Inbar Algov, the only female member and the youngest at 22. Liber and Ziony, both 38, are the senior members of the group.

Despite the ongoing violence that began 11 months ago in Israel, Gaya members retain the positive outlook embodied in their music.

Reflecting on their performance in the Diaspora for an audience of UJA supporters, Liber said it was great to see that Canadians think about Israel and give their time to help it. "It makes my heart feel warm."

"Amazing," agreed Yakobi.

Gaya's biggest hit in Israel is a song called Shir L'Ahava (Song for Love). Its message, said Ziony (a cousin to Zioni), boils down to, "Let's stop with all the balagan, as we say in Hebrew."

"We want to live in peace with everybody," said Liber. "We prefer to deal with the positive things in life, because we know there's a lot of difficult things in Israel, and not only in Israel [but for] all the people in the world."

New band members are chosen as much for their philosophy as for their musical ability. "We are like family. We belong together," said Liber, who noted that he also plays with Arab musicians, "because music is peace, music is love, and it doesn't matter if you're an Arab or a Jew, when you play music you feel love."

Music, said Tziony, is an international language. The group will be performing along with an Israeli Arab violinist at a world music festival to be held next month in Israel, he said.

Ziony, like Liber, was drawn to ethnic music before joining Gaya, in his case after returning to Israel following 14 years in San Diego.

"It's pretty happy, it's groovy," he said. "It's a lot of challenge to expand your musical knowledge."

"We hope and believe that the situation is going to get better, and we try to help with our prayer, with our music," said Liber. "We use our music like a prayer."

He never felt any conflict between his beliefs and service in the IDF, he said. "This is my country. If you're born and grow up in Israel, you know that at age 18 you have to go to the army. This is your land, your people. I love my land, and I want to give, because I know a lot of people, a lot of men, have given their lives for me. So it was great to give to my country."

UJA Federation sets campaign goal at $50 million

Israel needs our help, said Michael Bregman, co-chair of Campaign 2002 with David Koschitzky.

"Our community here is mobilized with monthly solidarity missions to Israel," said Bregman, mentioning also the Sept. 23 Queen's Park rally scheduled to coincide with rallies in other cities internationally. As he spoke, a contingent of an estimated 100 Arab protesters demonstrated outside the hotel.

This year it's not business as usual, he stated. The original campaign goal was $47 million ($4 million more than last year), but it has been upped to $50 million.

"Our 3,000-year-old community is asking us to answer the call," said Koschitzky. "We cannot say no." He said that people could help in two ways: by volunteering and by giving money.

A challenge fund of nearly $3 million has been created by community leaders to match gift increases, he added.

In a 25-minute address, Mitchell spoke of his experience as chair of the peace negotiations in Northern Ireland in the mid-1990s and his more recent experience in the Middle East.

"It may sound paradoxical," he said, in light of ongoing conflict in Northern Ireland, "but I've come to believe more fervently than ever that there isn't a conflict that can't be ended. No matter how ancient the conflict, no matter how hurtful, I believe with all my heart and soul that peace can prevail."

Although there have been serious problems implementing the 1998 peace agreement on Northern Ireland, the level of violence is way down, he said.

Leaders must create an attitude of hope, the belief that problems can be solved and that things can be better, he stated.

The current pessimism in the Middle East mirrors that which he found in Northern Ireland in 1995, he said. Leaders on both sides have endorsed the report and have told Mitchell and his team "in virtually identical words that life has become unbearable for their people."

The three main objectives outlined in the Mitchell Report involved ending the violence immediately and unconditionally, rebuilding confidence and resuming meaningful negotiations.

"Restoration of some level of trust is essential," said Mitchell.

Israel has been trying to implement the Mitchell Report, but there are parts "which are not easy for us," said Ambassador Avi Pazner, world chair of Keren Hayesod – United Israel Appeal. "But we did it out of a sense of responsibility, out of our yearning, our craving for peace."

Women's campaign chair Lesley Binstock Offman.

Israel has been trying for the past 27 years to reach peace with its neighbours, said Pazner, citing his own participation in the 1973 Geneva peace conference, and in 1978 talks at Camp David with then American President Jimmy Carter, Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin, and Egyptian President Anwar Sadat, among other efforts.

"We are the good guys," he proclaimed. "We were full of hopes, all of us...on the right, left or centre. Israel was living with a dream of peace and was paying a very high price to materialize this peace, but we did it willingly."

It's not important whether former Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak is right, said Pazner. "What is important is that [the concessions he offered] showed our readiness for peace, our willingness for enormous sacrifices."

The Palestinian answer was rejection, he clarified. "This is not an intifadah. This is a war, a war against the very concept of legitimation of a Jewish State, and we did not understand it in the first few weeks and months."

Israel does not occupy any foreign land, he stated. "We came back to the land of our ancestors and we try to defend the tiny bit of land the best way we can."

By negotiating with Israel, PA Chair Yasser Arafat could have had much, said Pazner. "By violence he will get absolutely nothing."

Israel has been successful in thwarting up to 90 percent of terrorist attacks, claimed Pazner. "We are fighting terrorism with all our might."

He lauded the support of the audience. "Together we the Jews of Israel and you, the Jews of Canada, are united like never before. We will defend our country together."

Reisman, in her comments following Pazner's rousing speech, noted that he was speaking to the converted. "All of us have an obligation to spread the message to those who could not join us, Jew and non-Jew alike."

To the surreal, now add the obscene

There has always been a large dose of the surreal attached to the deliberations of the United Nations. In its early days, in the aftermath of World War II, this was due primarily to the overlay of Cold War superpower geopolitics upon virtually all of the organization's operations and decisions.

Some two decades later, in the aftermath of the Six Day War, this was due to the cynical, even tyrannical subordination of UN organs and activities by the Soviet Union and its anti-western clientele of Arab/Islamic/"Non-Aligned" states.

Now, three decades later, the Iron Curtain no longer separating east from west, the Cold War a point of history rather than fact, the organization is tilted once again towards abject absurdity.

Seldom has the gap between its ideals and practices been wider.

The UN conference against racism, opening this week in Durban, South Africa, will publicly give over the gavel to a mean-spirited clatch of non-democratic, dictatorial, despotic, military regimes for the sole purpose of marginalizing Israel within the family of nations.

Now comes the likelihood that Syria will assume a seat on the Security Council in the fall. To the surreal, therefore, we must now add the obscene.

The primary purpose of the Security Council is to maintain international peace and security. That is its main responsibility. The very first words of the preamble of the UN Charter convey this purpose eloquently, if only, alas, as a dream and a reverie: "We the peoples of the United Nations determined... to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small, and... [for these ends] to practice tolerance and live together in peace with one another as good neighbours, and to unite our strength to maintain international peace and security..."

There could hardly be a more overwhelmingly inappropriate regime for governance upon the Security Council than the oppressive, totalitarian, brutish government of Syria. Its complete disregard of fundamental human rights is one of the key features that sets it apart from all western nations and from many others. Indeed, it is still officially listed by the U.S. State Department as one of the countries, along with such other exemplars of UN ideals as North Korea, Iran and Libya, as sponsors of international terrorism. And its chief foreign policy goals remains unchanged: the destruction of the State of Israel.

If decency and integrity are considered to be part of the hallmarks of Canadian foreign policy, there can be no doubt about Canada's vote on the upcoming question of Syrian membership in the Security Council. We must not vote in favour. An affirmative vote would endorse values most antithetical to our own.

Merchant an anti-Semitic play

This is in response to your front-page article in the issue of Aug. 2. While Paul Soles is the first Canadian Jew to play Shylock at Stratford, one should remember that this part was once offered to the great Yiddish actor-director, the late Maurice Swartz, for a Broadway production. Such a long-running engagement would have brought him money and prestige. He turned it down, saying, "Audiences don't come to see Maurice Swartz eat pork on stage!"

No matter how skilfully an actor plays the role, a Jewish person watching the play cannot help but cringe at the shabby portrayal of Shylock the Jew. It is fine to say that "Shakespeare is full of blows to various ethnicities," but the scene where Shylock is defeated is particularly humiliating. He is forced to kneel, his yarmulke is yanked off his head and he is spat upon, compelled to exist, deflated, wearing a cross. This scene is followed by one with a frivolity and gaiety that is extremely offensive.

Soles refers to "the nuances intended by the playwright." Shakespeare masterfully created a play that assured box-office success, cleverly designing the plot so as to rouse the rabble at the Globe Theatre into hissing and booing. Yet The Merchant of Venice remains an anti-Semitic play. I shudder to think that busloads of Ontario schoolchildren will be taken to see it.

Canada should attend conference

There is a certain ridiculous irony in the fact that the organizational meeting for the World Conference Against Racism took place in Tehran, Iran: there is no more repressive and terrorist-sponsoring nation on the face of the earth. It has been reported that the United States will boycott the conference if the odious Zionism-equals-racism resolution is put on the agenda, yet I think the United States, as well as Canada, should be present to vociferously oppose the resolution's passing and to reaffirm before all nations gathered the true and basic tenets of Zionism.

In defence of Sharon

With all the slander and accusations being levelled at Israeli Prime Minisher Ariel Sharon from all quarters, including the BBC regarding the Sabra and Shatila massacres, it is mind boggling that no one in Jewish PR has pointed out a crucial factor in his defence. I am referring to the fact that prior to 1982, the Muslims in Lebanon were massacring the Lebanese Christians by the thousands and burning their churches. The Lebanese Christians made six clandestine trips to Israel pleading for assistance and military intervention to help them in their plight. An Israeli coalition government under prime minister Menachem Begin acceded to their pleas for help in 1982.

With regard to the outrageous charges of genocide and war crimes of which Sharon has been accused, those in charge of Jewish PR should be counter-attacking and charging Sharon's accusers of their own war crimes and genocides.

Responding to Karilani

I read with interest the column "About Teens" in your Aug. 2 issue dealing with the double cohort (university entrance) problem in 2003.

Karilani's advice to the worried Grade 10 Jewish high school student was well-balanced. She suggested looking at all the pros and cons before deciding to stay in a Jewish high school or to leave for higher marks. However, as principal of general studies at CHAT, I believe there were a few points missing from her list.

The double cohort issue and the perceived pressure for high marks is a province-wide problem and not just a Jewish high school concern. Summer school this year was jam-packed with classes of 35 to 40 students as worried individuals in every jurisdiction fast tracked to avoid graduating in 2003.

No one, it seems, trusts the government's promise to students and their parents that there will be enough places for those who are accepted into universities in 2003. This doubt exists even though the government announced in May a budget of $300 million for dealing with the anticipated demand for additional places. And the government followed up with another announcement in July that it will open a new University of Technology in Oshawa.

Will these announcements comfort the graduates of 2003? It seems to me that the seats will be available. The more important question is: will the student have a high-enough average to be accepted?

Achieving high enough marks to get into a university of choice has never been a problem for graduates from Jewish high schools. Past experience, in fact, supports the evidence that marks in Jewish high schools are competitive on average with that of any other high school in the Greater Toronto Area.

In addition, students who graduate from Jewish high schools tend to do better at university because of study, organizational and time-management skills acquired by attending a double curriculum program. The graduates' analytical and writing abilities are also stronger because of their work in Talmud, Tanach and Jewish history courses that they take along with their regular general studies courses.

The advice I would offer the student is to stay in the Jewish high school and take advantage of what it can offer.

Jewish students' role on campus

By SIMON BENSIMON

In September 2000, the Hillel in Montreal organized the first in a series of free Shabbat dinners for university students. About 150 students gathered for kabalat Shabbat, dinner, a d'var Torah and an address by Dr. Bernard Shapiro, principal of McGill University.

Shapiro spoke about the impact of the university on Jews and the impact of Jews on the university. He said his office now has a mezuzah, and that he feels it is his duty to sensitize the administration to issues such as scheduling exams during religious holidays. He also encouraged the students present to take advantage of campus life and everything it has to offer.

I am sure that a number of them began thinking of their role as a Jewish student on a university campus. Was their Jewishness an issue at all? Must Jewish students feel compelled to involve themselves Jewishly, whether through courses or some sort of campus-based activism?

On campuses with large Jewish populations, there are two categories of Jewish students – those encountering the "outside world" for the first time and those finding themselves "surrounded" by Jews for the first time. On smaller campuses, Jewish students are often called upon to become representatives of Judaism. Whatever the case, it takes courage and maturity to position oneself Jewishly on campus.

As we approach the first anniversary of the current intifadah, which seems to have no real end in sight, Jewish students throughout North America will once again be called upon, under very difficult circumstances, to defend Israel's right to exist. On campuses throughout Canada, the Palestinian cause, and by default, anti-Israel/anti-Zionist sentiments, have become part of the anti-establishment, anti-globalization movement. All Jewish communal organizations, including Hillel, are considered to be reactionary and oppressive, not to mention fascistic. Frequently, only Jews who denounce Zionism and the Jewish State are considered to be sensible and progressive.

In spite of all this, thousands of Jewish students on campuses throughout Canada get involved, celebrate their Judaism, defend Israel and bring a Jewish component to student government, activism and the arts.

In Montreal, as in other cities, Jewish students from all backgrounds have mobilized themselves because of the crisis in Israel. They have developed educational materials, launched Web sites such as www.israelpride.com, published ads in campus newspapers, stood behind countless information tables, and organized Israel days, rallies and demonstrations. When push came to shove, this generation of Jewish young people did not sit back and do nothing.

> 'Being able to set aside peer pressure and concentrate on who you are'

Jewish involvement on campus is not only about reacting to anti-Israel propaganda. It's mostly about being able to grow Jewishly in a dynamic and interesting environment. University life is about learning, inside and outside the classroom. It's also about being able to set aside peer pressure and concentrate on who you are and what you will become. For many, it's a time when tastes, interests and habits develop that will remain for a lifetime. It's a time when we become who we really are.

Those of us involved in building Jewish identity and community must make sure that our outreach efforts and programming are dynamic and intelligent, and have added value to what is easily attainable on campus.

Hillel student centres throughout Canada must offer educational, social, cultural, religious and even food services that are second to none – or else we will find ourselves sitting alone, trying to figure out where we failed. We must also attract dynamic and committed student leaders who see in Jewish communal volunteerism the opportunity to enrich their lives and become full-fledged members of the Jewish community.

Students have always been ready, able and willing to lead and be masters of their own destinies. We fondly remember the student struggles for Soviet Jewry, activism on behalf of Ethiopian Jewry and Zionist student groups. When given the opportunity, students can make a difference.

Today, in communities such as Montreal's, they are once again being called upon to lead, and they are doing it with great energy. They organized a Purim party with 1,200 people here (only because 400 more were not allowed through the door), as well as Shabbat dinners with 400 people, film festivals, arts festivals, concerts, spiritual happenings, Shoah commemorations, late-night Torah societies, business cocktails and much more.

An impressive cadre of student leaders throughout the country are reaching out to thousands of their peers and engaging them in Jewish student life. They are the lifeline of our organization and the future leaders of our communities.

And our efforts as campus leaders are only the tip of the iceberg. There are hundreds – no thousands – of Jewish students out there who don't even know what they are missing. They are not coming through our doors for a variety of reasons. For most, we are still "too Jewish" and campus life is about "broadening your horizons," "leaving the ghetto." Only through openness and creativity will we be able to demonstrate what Judaism and Jewish life have to offer and that they reach far beyond all preconceived notions of Jewish communal organizations.

The Birthright Israel program, for example has enabled us to reach out to hundreds of students who do not understand what we are all about and are too frightened to take the plunge. The free trip not only exposes them to the wonders of Israel and the magnitude of Judaism, it also exposes them to other young people like themselves. The madrichim (group leaders) act as peer counsellors and become their point of entry into the Jewish world upon their return.

When you, the Jewish student, unpack your summer bag and start packing your school stuff, think about what you will do as a Jewish person on campus. Whatever you do, make sure it's meaningful and fun. And for those of you who decide that it's time to test those leadership attributes, give us a call – we have offices from Halifax to Vancouver. It would be really great to hear from you. The bottom line is that you are the future leaders of our community, and we need you much more than you need us. Let's think about that.

Simon Bensimon is the executive director of the Hillel Jewish Student Centres of Montreal.

The good old days

This column is addressed particularly to my older readers. I often hear friends and acquaintances in the "old age" category deliver themselves of the judgment: "There is no question that the good old days were better than what we are living through now. No wonder young people have a tough time of it. We were better off than they are today."

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Many of you have probably had the same experience that I have had. I particularly remember that when I was young, I heard older people say this all the time.

In my youth, they were referring to the days of the end of the 19th century, which to them were the golden years – unalloyed by the terrible experience of the first and second world wars, unemployment, horrible inflation, and especially the rise of anti-Semitism.

Perhaps some of my readers remember the "good old days" that their parents and grandparents experienced in the shtetl — forgetting, of course, that it was characterized to a large degree by great poverty, a narrow existence and rampant discrimination by the majority.

But this praise of the putative wonders of days gone by is already recorded in the Torah. When our ancestors were wandering in the desert and experienced thirst and hunger, they were recalling what they considered "the good old days" in Egypt, forgetting that the availability of modest nourishment was accompanied by the terrors of slavery.

I learned that the wondrous times of the 1890s were good for only about two or three percent of society; the rest had to make do with very modest incomes and, all too frequently, miserable living conditions.

I was still young when my dad called attention to a verse in the Tanach and found in Kohelet (Eccl. 7:10), which says: "Do not say that the olden days were better than today, for when you say this you do not display any wisdom."

During these times of intifadah, we are moved, as are many Israelis, to long for the imagined blessings of earlier times. In the end, however, we have always been – and hopefully will remain – optimists: we look ahead to better days than the ones we are living through. The Torah says, for instance, that poverty will always be with us, but we labour to reduce it as much as we can so that, if we are successful at all, we may say "the bad old days."

There is an old saying that comparisons always limp. Both sides of the equation have elements in their favour, and applied to human experience, that's the way it always will be. Hopefully, we will always look back, because history is fascinating and instructive, but it is the present and the future in which we invest our efforts.

Little ado about leadership

The Labour party leadership race is defined more by those who are absent from it than by those who are active in it. Neither of the two contenders, Avraham Burg and Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, has succeeded in capturing the imagination of the party rank and file, nor, for that matter, of the public at large.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Ehud Barak's resignation in the aftermath of his failure at the polls reopened a leadership race that had elected him party leader as recently as 1997. This time, however, Yossi Beilin, Shlomo Ben-Ami and Ephraim Sneh, candidates at the time, stayed away. In the shock of last February's defeat, all three preferred different options. Sneh, now minister of transport, was one of the seven Labour MKs elected to serve in the national unity government by the party central committee. Ben-Ami has been writing his version of the failure of the peace talks, while Beilin, true to form, is independently and indefatigably pursuing the potential for negotiations with the Palestinians.

Avraham Burg, described as the "perfect candidate," has nursed his leadership ambition for years. During the '80s, he was the wunderkind of Israeli politics who had burst onto the public stage with impassioned speeches against the Lebanon war once he returned from reserve duty on the front line. Later, as chair of the Jewish Agency, and more recently, as speaker of the Knesset, he has used these public platforms to aggressively promote his iconoclastic image. An observant Jew who believes in the separation of religion and state and a gifted public speaker, Burg positions himself as a bridge-builder who can appeal to religious and secular Israelis alike. In keeping with the current mood of the country, he has deliberately moved from his traditional dovish position to the centre.

Burg's critics argue that he has never held an executive position of responsibility, and that his rhetoric masks inexperience and superficiality. During this campaign, an expose in one of the leading tabloid dailies, alleging excessive spending on the perks of office in the Knesset's speaker's office, may have dealt Burg a fatal blow.

Ben-Eliezer (aka Fouad) is a lacklustre party man who now serves as Sharon's minister of defence in the unity government. He is competing by default, and has a chance just because no other candidates have emerged. A longtime Yitzhak Rabin supporter, Fouad is emphasizing his years of experience in government, and the various cabinet portfolios he held under Rabin. Since he has been historically identified with the "hawkish" wing of the Labour party, and since he has supported a harsh stance against the Palestinians during the current intifadah, his movement during the campaign has been to the left. Fouad now says that every effort must be made to return to the negotiating table with the Palestinians.

Burg and Fouad hail from different traditions and camps in the Labour party's historic Peres-Rabin rivalry. Burg is a Peres protégé, and was one of the members of the "group of eight" young liberals who tried to shape the party's direction over the last two decades. Fouad was a Rabin loyalist who stayed the middle course on security and social policy issues. Ehud Barak has endorsed him, while Sneh and Beilin have endorsed Burg. Each is trying to make inroads into his rival's natural constituency, and both are encountering apathy and indifference. Nearly 50 percent of eligible voters in the party have said they will ignore next week's vote.

The race is for leadership of a party that has been weakened (and some would argue rendered irrelevant) by a resounding defeat and a violent challenge to the peace policy with which it became identified in the last decade. Polls show that if an election were held now, Labour's Knesset representation would drop to an all-time low of 20 seats. In today's climate, neither Burg nor Fouad is likely to pose a successful challenge to Sharon – and certainly not to Netanyahu, who is plotting in the wings for his comeback chance. But Israeli politics often confound the pundits. If Sharon's coalition falls as a result of the defection of either its right or left partners, Labour will likely return to the wilderness of opposition. If it survives its term, Labour may become a reasonable alternative after all. Stay tuned.

To Jerusalem and back

Israelis and friends of Israel use the word hamatsav to refer to the troubled situation in the Middle East. While it is certainly true that life goes on in many normal and wonderful ways, it is also true that there is a grim sense of despair and anger that has taken hold. I just returned from a too-short visit to Israel, where I attended the World Congress of Jewish Studies. I heard very few Israelis responding with the traditional ye'hiyeh tov (things will work out). Here are some vignettes which capture the mood.

Marvin Wenfeld in Montreal

Before I left, more than a few Canadian friends and colleagues looked sombre when I told them I was going to Israel, particularly to Jerusalem. And frankly, for the first time, I thought twice about the issue of safety and whether or not I really ought to go, particularly after the bombing of the Jerusalem pizzeria. Even though I went, these feelings and hesitations are a triumph for Israel's enemies.

In Israel, for the first time, people on two occasions thanked me for coming. One was a cab driver, the other an Israeli delegate to the congress. Canadian Jews who want to support Israel should make a point of just being there. Tourism, which accounts by some estimates for up to 15 percent of the Israeli economy, has been devastated.

The conference I attended was notable for the relatively high proportion of Israelis who were present, compared to those from the outside, especially from North America. One organizer told me that about 150 scheduled delegates cancelled or did not appear, out of an already reduced number.

Life goes on, but people have changed their lifestyles to become more security conscious. I did not eat a meal in Jerusalem's downtown restaurants. Instead, I ate with some friends in an outdoor restaurant in the suburb of Talpiyot. During the meal, the ex-Montrealer and now Israeli who was eating with us was speaking on the cell phone to his son who was in or near his tank, trying to get home in time for his sister's wedding. The same person told us at the end of the meal that he had been scanning the street traffic while we were eating, just in case.

Speaking of cell phones, it is true that every Israeli over 10 seems to have one. But in Israel, it is far more than a fad or an affectation. When a bomb goes off, all phone lines are jammed as the whole country dials up to check if loved ones are safe.

The malls are packed, compared to other shopping areas. The reason is that the malls, with their stringent security at each entrance and in the parking garages, are now among the safest places in Israel, especially for children.

My relatives in Rehovot have a 10-year-old son. This summer, instead of sending him to camp as they had last year, they took him along on a family vacation to Europe, afraid that the field trips and sporting events might be too tempting a target.

The next few years will tax Diaspora Jewry like never before. Israel is not winning the full-scale public relations battle that is presently afoot. The official Israeli case, coming out of the Oslo accords and subsequent negotiations, is easy to make. It is logical and sensible. Its goal is a peace treaty between a Jewish State and a Palestinian state, with mutual obligations and responsibilities, emerging from compromise and negotiated agreements.

This is not what Arab and Palestinian spokespersons want. They want a Lebanese solution. They make no mention of peace treaties, of normalized relations, of agreements, or of responsibilities. All their rhetoric is aimed at achieving an Israeli withdrawal from (all) the territories, a dismantling of Jewish settlements, a sharing of Jerusalem, and a return of refugees. And as recent pronouncements reveal, these demands, at least for some Palestinian leaders, are in fact just a first step towards the dream of a greater Palestine stretching to the Mediterranean.

While Palestinian leaders have for years admitted that they recognized Israel – after all, Israel is a fact – they now seem less clearly committed to recognizing the "legitimacy" of Israel's existence, as a Jewish State in the Middle East. Perhaps they feel they can win through demoralization what they could not through war. There are two ways Diaspora Jews can help support Israel in these difficult days. One is by speaking up, confidently, as never before. The other is by visiting Israel whenever possible.

Right-wing political extremism in Israel

When Yigal Amir, a 25-year-old Bar Ilan University law student, assassinated Yitzhak Rabin six years ago, there was an audible gasp of shock and incredulity in Israel and the Diaspora.

How could a Jew murder a fellow Jew in a country besieged by Arab enemies?

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

That insistent question, though valid and understandable, was beside the point historically.

Throughout its pre- and post-state history, violence has been an ugly ingredient in Israel's domestic politics. From Chaim Arlosoroff's assassination in 1933 to Baruch Goldstein's pathological rampage in 1994, an extremist thread has run through the fabric of Israeli society.

Most recently, this unfortunate phenomenon asserted itself when Ehud Barak was prime minister. In a bid to hammer out an end-of-conflict agreement with Yasser Arafat, Barak reportedly offered the Palestinians what had, until then, been unimaginable concessions – more than 90 percent of the West Bank, all of the Gaza Strip and shared sovereignty in eastern Jerusalem.

Barak's offer, spurned by Arafat at last July's Camp David summit, enraged Jewish settlers in the territories, as well as right-wing Israeli politicians. Barak, they charged, planned to give the store away. Such was the backlash against Barak that the Shin Bet – Israel's internal security agency – warned that extremists might try to murder him. And Ephraim Sneh, then the deputy defence minister, said the recriminations reminded him of the atmosphere on the eve of Rabin's assassination.

Ehud Sprinzak, a Hebrew University scholar, knows a thing or two about right-wing extremism in Israel. In Brother Against Brother (The Free Press), a chilling and knowing account of the roots of violence in Israel's political culture, he suggests that Arlosoroff's slaying was a precursor of the malaise that continues to haunt Israel.

A young and promising Labour movement leader, he was gunned down by Zionist Revisionist thugs. Like ancient Jewish zealots in the last days of the Second Temple period and European fascists in the 1920s and 1930s, they were not loath to use violence to achieve political goals. In his case, they resented Arlosoroff's role in the negotiation of an agreement with Nazi Germany concerning the immigration of German Jews to Palestine.

The Arlosoroff affair, however, was symptomatic of the tensions that had already poisoned relations between moderate and radical Zionists.

At stake were deep policy differences over relations with the British colonial administrators and strategies regarding nation building. Civility and mutual respect were alien concepts during this acrimonious and long-running debate. Both movements believed that they held a monopoly on the truth.

The so-called Season, which ran from October 1944 to March 1945, exacerbated the mutual animosity. Having concluded that the Irgun's terrorist campaign against Britain was counter-productive, the Haganah – the primary Jewish military force in Palestine – cracked down on that Revisionist militia, severely damaging its operational capabilities. And in a number of instances, the Haganah turned over Irgun commanders to the British.

These incidents, the scuttling of the Altalena in June 1948 and the Irgun's assassination of United Nations envoy Count Folke Bernadotte three months later, widened the gulf between Israel's prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, and the leader of the Herut, Menachem Begin.

Violence flared again after Israel signed a reparations agreement with West Germany in the 1950s. Yet there is no evidence that Begin authorized the violence, writes Sprinzak, an authority on extremism, terrorism and religious fundamentalism in Israel.

During the early years of Israeli statehood, one of the most charismatic figures on the far right was Israel Eldad (Scheib), a former commander of the Lehi, a breakaway faction of the Irgun. Eldad spoke of the need to continue the War of Independence until Israel's borders reached the Nile River in the west and the Euphrates River in the east.

According to Sprinzak, Eldad, in 1949, inspired two yeshiva students to form an anti-government group. Known as B'rith Hakana'im, it vandalized and burned coffee shops, restaurants and movie theatres supposedly desecrating the Sabbath.

In 1951, former Lehi members founded an outfit called The Kingdom of Israel. Its operations were more eclectic, ranging from the burning of non-kosher butcher shops in Tel Aviv to the storming of Jordanian outposts near Jerusalem in retaliation for Arab terrorism launched from Jordan.

At the end of 1952, after the infamous Doctors' trial in Moscow and the Slansky show trial in Prague, the Kingdom of Israel set fire to the Czech mission and the Soviet embassy in Tel Aviv. The repercussions were serious. Within 48 hours, Moscow severed diplomatic relations with Israel. Then, following a Shin Bet investigation, Israeli police found large caches of arms and explosives belonging to the Kingdom of Israel.

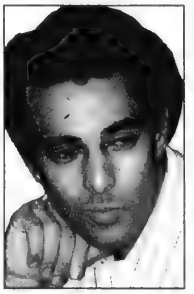
On March 3, 1957, a new chapter in right-wing violence broke out with the fatal shooting of Rudolph Kastner. Sprinzak claims that he was the first Jewish victim of political assassination in Israel.

A lawyer and journalist, Kastner headed the Rescue Committee in Hungary during World War II. In 1944, he negotiated a "blood for goods" agreement with Adolf Eichmann in a desperate attempt to save Hungarian Jewry from mass deportation. Though never consummated, the deal earned Kastner the enmity of Malkiel Greenwald, a religious Hungarian Jew who accused him of collaborating with the Germans.

The Kastner affair reaked of partisan politics. The attorney hired to defend Greenwald, Shmuel Tamir, had been a deputy Irgun commander in Jerusalem. He shared the Revisionist conviction that the Labour leadership in Palestine had not really tried to save Jews during the Holocaust. And so, Tamir viewed the trial as a redemptive opportunity to settle the score for the Season, the sinking of the Altalena and the German reparations furor.

In a separate chapter on haredi violence, Sprinzak reviews the riots instigated by the anti-Zionist Neturei Karta over Sabbath traffic in and around Mea Shearim, archeological excavations in the City of David and the construction of a Mormon campus on the Mount of Olives.

Not confining himself to right-wing violence, Sprinzak chronicles the extra-parliamentary activities of Siah, a Marxist movement that vehemently opposed Israel's settlement of the territories, and of the anti-Establishment Black Panthers, which championed the cause of Israel's Sephardi underclass.



Yigal Amir

The balance of Brother Against Brother focuses on the Jewish settlers' movement (which responded violently to Palestinian terrorism), Israel's withdrawal from the Sinai Peninsula and the Oslo peace process.

As a result of the murder of six yeshiva students in Hebron in 1980, the newly-formed Jewish Underground blew up the cars of five Palestinian leaders, crippling two of them. And when another yeshivah student was killed in Hebron in 1983, settlers attacked the Islamic College of Hebron, causing the deaths of three students. Sprinzak claims that these acts of terrorism were condoned by rabbis in sympathy with the settlers.

The Movement to Halt the Retreat in Sinai (MHRS) never really considered violence to stop the evacuation of such Israeli settlements as Yamit and Neot Sinai. But Gush Emunim activists refused to leave these outposts, triggering a confrontation with the army.

Sprinzak says that Elyakim Ha'etzni, a settler from Kiryat Arba, was the first "to introduce the language of personal delegitimation" into the vocabulary of the radical right.

As early as 1985, he threatened Shimon Peres, the then prime minister, with death for considering the idea of an international peace conference to discuss the disposition of the territories. Since then, this maverick has devoted much of his intellectual energy to developing a strategy of civil disobedience in case of a decision by Israel to evacuate the settlements in the West Bank and Gaza.

Zo Artzenu, founded after Olso, took this credo to new heights, mounting an aggressive campaign of civil disobedience in 1995. Its protests occasionally deteriorated into violence, and, psychologically, set the stage for Rabin's assassination.

Sprinzak does not believe that Israel will descend into civil war, even if a future Israeli government adopts a dovish policy with respect to territorial compromise. He is convinced that the trauma over Rabin's assassination will have a restraining influence on most Israelis.

He may be right. But who can be absolutely sure? Does another Yigal Amir lurk in the wings?

Jewish Life

'Make yourself a heart of many rooms'

By RABBI HOWARD MORRISON

The story is told of a Jew asking the identical question to three rabbis. One rabbi responds to the query that whatever it is you are looking for, Jewish law forbids it. Another rabbi responds, whatever it is you are looking for, use your autonomy and make your own educated decision. The last rabbi responds, we'll send your question to a committee of scholars, which will ultimately deliver a split opinion.

During this week in the Jewish calendar, we have read Parshat Shoftim, which contains a specific verse about religious leadership: "You shall appear before the Levitical priests, or magistrate in charge at the time, and present your problem. When they have announced to you the verdict in the case, you shall carry out the verdict that is announced to you… You shall act in accordance with the instructions given you and the ruling handed down to you…" (Deut. 17:9-11).

According to the 12th-century scholar Maimonides, the sages used this biblical text to justify the blessings which state that God "has commanded us" – to read the scroll of Esther, to kindle the Shabbat and Chanukah lights – even though there is no record of its command. But "the instructions given you" tell us to follow the sages.

In the talmudic tractate Rosh Hashanah (25b), we learn from the biblical verse cited: "Can we then imagine that a person should go to a judge who is not in his days? This shows that you must be content to go the judge who is in your days. It also says: Say not, how was it that the former days were better than these (Eccl. 7:10)."

Today, we no longer recognize one definitive source of rabbinic authority. Some would suggest that there never was an absolutely agreed upon source of rabbinic authority. The 16-century Shulchan Aruch became a classically accepted code of Jewish law only when the comments of Rabbi Moses Isserles (the Rema), an Ashkenazi decisor, were joined with the comments of Rabbi Joseph Karo, a Sephardi decisor. In Israel today, one recognizes both an Ashkenazi and Sephardi chief rabbi.

In today's Diaspora, rabbis represent a broad spectrum of denominational and ideological perspectives. Even rabbis representing the same movement may appear philosophically apart in many ways. So how do Jews apprehend the Torah's statement, as expounded by our tradition, that one turn "to the judge who is in your day?"

On one level, for those who are synagogue affiliated, your congregation's appointed rabbi is your personal religious decisor. Yet while this approach may work on the local level, how does the collective Jewish community respond to the variety of rabbinic voices? Should only some be heard and others ignored?

As a former student of Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik, of blessed memory, I remember one of his most well-quoted statements. All Jews share in two kinds of covenantal relationship – a covenant of faith and a covenant of fate. Even where rabbis and the Jews they represent disagree on matters of faith, all Jews are interconnected by a covenant of fate that transcends all else.

In one of Rabbi David Hartman's most recent works, A Heart of Many Rooms: Celebrating the Many Voices within Judaism, he writes: "A person might think, 'since the House of Shammai declare unclean and the House of Hillel clean, this one prohibits and this one permits, how, then can I learn Torah?' Scripture says ... 'all the words have been given by a single Shepherd, one God created them, our Provider gave them, the Lord of all deeds, blessed be He, has spoken them. So make yourself a heart of many rooms and bring into it the words of the House of Shammai and the words of the House of Hillel,'" (Tosefta Sota 7:12).

As I complete my first year of rabbinic service in Toronto, I am grateful to be part of a community which appreciates a Jewish heart of many rooms, where Jews representing a wide array of beliefs and practices can unite for the overall good. The Toronto Board of rabbis had 10 rabbis, representing two denominations, visit Israel together on a mission of solidarity. On the lay level, Toronto can boast of its Yom Hashoah and Yom Ha'atzmaut commemorations.

Yet is there not more we could do together as rabbis and as members of the fastest-growing Jewish community in North America? In the biblical spirit of ve'ahavta l're'acha kamochah (love thy neighbour as thyself), and in the rabbinic spirit of al tifros min ha'tzibbur (do not withdraw from the community); can we not develop more vital programs which could deepen our collective involvement and concern?

As a new year dawns, I pray that appointed Jewish community leaders recognize each other's place within the fabric of the entire community. Without sacrificing our personal convictions, we can and must do all we can to share in the covenant of faith and fate in the spirit of Ahavat Yisrael.

Rabbi Morrison is the spiritual leader of the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto.

Time for self-reflection

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In these few weeks leading up to Rosh Hashanah, we often engage in self-reflection. Rosh Hashanah is the start of our year; it is also the time in which God is evaluating our deeds and making Divine decisions about our futures. It seems that there is a distance between us and God at this time, and it can be quite intimidating.

However, the Talmud makes many references to how we should mould our behaviours toward each other based on God's modelling of appropriate behaviour. Keeping God as a model upon which to base our interactions is a way to keep the Divine close as we approach the Days of Awe.

The Talmud uses examples of simple etiquette that God has extended to human beings through daily communication. For example, the phrase that appears often in the Torah: "And God called to Moses and God said…" begs the question of redundancy. Why does God call first and not simply begin speaking? The Talmud comments that this teaches us to greet a person before engaging in a conversation.

In fact, we learn that we should initiate that greeting and not wait for another person to acknowledge us first. How often do we find ourselves in social situations where we recognize someone across the room but we wait for them to acknowledge us? If the others do not greet us first, we are hesitant to greet them. In some cases we are offended that they slighted us by not saying hello, but we neglect to recognize that we likewise did not say hello.

All kinds of assumptions then ensue based on the missing greeting and we walk away insulted, feeling negative about the other person. An entire silent interchange took place with negative results based on the absence of the word "hello." If God could exhibit humility in greeting Moses, how could we stand on formality with our fellow human beings?

Lessons of compassion and companionship are likewise brought out by the Talmud from the Torah for us to consider. When Abraham is recovering from his circumcision, God initiates a visit to Abraham's tent, and from this we learn the importance of visiting the sick. When we spend our days involved in hurting others and ignoring God and we are granted another year of life, God has demonstrated forgiveness and compassion. How could we not extend those same virtues to others?

Often, people study the Torah and are troubled by what they perceive as the negative side of the Divine. The awesome plagues and punishments, the sudden anger that is described in the text can be overwhelming. Yet not enough time is spent building our model for daily behaviour based on the attributes of God that are likewise described in the text. According to Genesis, we are created in God's image and therefore all those positive attributes are present within us.

The Talmud makes this point beautifully in its comment on the opening line of the Song at the Sea. Moses and Israel speak of God by saying: "This is my God and I will glorify Him."

The Hebrew word for the phrase "glorify Him" is anvehu. Abba Saul comments that the word should be split into two parts: "ani" which means "I," "v'vehu" which means "and Him." In other words, I and God stand together in one word in the book of Exodus.

My relationship with my fellow human beings can be a reflection of the union between "I" and "Him," and I can glorify God by striving toward this union.

Resources on Jewish genealogy

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Next month, as we read the book of Bereshit, we will be given quite a clear record of the births and deaths of the personalities of the Bible. Thousands of years later, there is little doubt who begat whom.

Our extended family trees, however, are rarely that clear.

That's why it's ironic that one of the best tools to investigate our history is almost one of the most modern – the Internet. With a bit of research and luck, you may be able to shed new light on your family's history. In this week's column, I focus on the very best place to start your hunt.

Unlike most Web sites, JewishGen: The Home of Jewish Genealogy is actually many sites in one [www.jewishgen.org]. In addition to its own extensive resources, it also hosts other, related genealogical Web sites. Start off your hunt in the Frequently Asked Questions area [http://www.jewishgen.org/infofiles/faq.html]. This massive document will not only give you an overview of JewishGen but will tell you how to get started in Jewish genealogy with advice about everything from finding ocean liner passenger lists going back to 1800 to locating a local Jewish genealogy society. There are even recommendations for the best genealogical software.

When you visit the JewishGen Family Finder, you can hunt for your family name (or your ancestral town) from a database of over a quarter million entries [http://www.jewishgen.org/jgff/]. This incredible resource is the work of over 45,000 Jewish genealogists worldwide. It allows you to search for a name and will even forgive you if you are a bit fuzzy about the spelling. As with many other areas of JewishGen, you are invited to add your own information to the database.

There are many specialized Jewish special interest groups (SIGs) devoted to Jews from specific countries and regions such as Germany [www.jewishgen.org/GerSIG] and Galicia [www.jewishgen.org/Galicia] or another for Sephardim [www.jewishgen.org/SefardSIG].

One of the newest SIGs is a little different. The rabbinic ancestry special interest group has just been established to act as a central clearing house for rabbinic genealogy. According to this site, as many as one in 50 Jews alive today has a rabbinic ancestry. Also, the site says, for most Ashkenazi Jews, surnames are a relatively recent invention – less than 200 years old. Rabbinical families seem to have been the exception to this rule. The use and adoption of surnames for these families dates back to as early as the 15th century, if not earlier, thus preceding all other family names by about 350 years.

There are some extremely helpful online tools that will help you in your hunt [http://www.jewishgen.org/jos/]. The Calendar Conversion page calculates dates to/from Gregorian and Jewish calendars. If you need to know how far it is from Plonsk to Minsk, just plug the longitude and latitude into the Distance Calculator (it's a distance of 94.5 km). And if you want to find out more about the family's shtetl, go to ShtetlSeeker – Town Search [http://www.jewishgen.org/ShtetlSeeker/loctown.htm].

At some point in your travels, you will have questions about the best way to research your family's history. The JewishGen Discussion Group offers a moderated e-mail list and a newsgroup [http://www.jewishgen.org/JewishGen/DiscussionGroup.htm]. Plus, there are specialized mailing lists for people with special interests [http://www.jewishgen.org/listserv/sigs.htm]. And because someone may have already asked and answered your question, you can check out the JewishGen Discussion Group Message Archives which go back to 1993.

Special to The CJN

On the evenings before a young man goes in the IDF, neither he nor his parents sleep too much. The soon-to-be IDF inductee parties with his friends. But the parents also do not sleep, out of worry, fear and apprehension.

Last week, we accompanied our firstborn son, Noam, to the IDF army recruitment centre in Jerusalem, where he was inducted into an IDF combat unit, with three months of basic training lying ahead of him.

Our Noam, 19, was named after a soldier, Noam Yehuda, who was born in Philadelphia, grew up in Safed, and was killed by a missile at the age of nineteen, on the fourth day of the Lebanon War in 1982.

The enemy was then PLO chair Yasser Arafat and his army, who had set up a worldwide terrorist organization from his base in Lebanon and was held responsible for the murders and massacres of hundreds of Jews and Israelis throughout the world.

The irony is that our own Noam, 19 years later, is going to be forced to fight the same enemy – this time on our own land.

Unlike many other Israelis, Noam holds a U.S. passport. He could easily skip the country without too much difficulty and attend university in the United States.

But he chooses to stay and serve. When you take your son on that proverbial ride to the draft induction point, his entire life flashes in front of you. All those special moments are squashed into those twenty five minutes of negotiating Jerusalem rush-hour traffic. His moment of birth. His brit. His first crawls. His first day in nursery school. His first day in first grade. His performance in the local singing group and how he "cut" his first cassette. His bar mitzvah. His going off to yeshiva. His summer job with youngsters with Down syndrome. And his resounding Shabbat meal send-off with his friends, when they sang at the top of their lungs, when we heard varying sounds, varying from psalms to punk rock.

A few nights ago, we watched the evening news with Noam. Thousands of Arab rioters shooting guns wildly in the air, as they ran through the streets toting the teetering body of yet another shahid – holy martyr (a title given to terrorists who blow themselves up with innocent Israeli civilians for the "glory of Palestine"). Noam's comment was, "Well, wish me luck! I'm going to be in a war."

His mood on the day of his induction was enthusiastic and adventurous. He was joined by two friends from his yeshiva who were being recruited together with him as well as by three other friends who had come to part with him and wish him luck. Watching him joke with his friends while waiting to be called to get on the bus, our hearts swelled with pride at this wholesome, fine son of ours who was eager to serve his country despite the gruesome predicament it is in right now.

This past year has been a year of reflection for Noam. He was glad to have made the decision not to go straight into the army following graduation from high school. Instead he chose a yeshiva program with a curriculum that prepares students for the army service through deep philosophical discussions and basic physical education.

It has also been a year of funerals. Too many funerals. Noam told us after returning from the funeral of our daughter's 20-year-old youth counsellor who had been shot dead in a drive-by shooting that, "Now I know what I am going into the army for. Going to all these funerals has made me aware of what I must do: to protect the people of Israel."

At the induction centre, Noam's name was called out only a few minutes after we got there. The time had come to part, to hand over to the IDF a wholesome, happy, wonderful son. Noam stretched out his arms and held each of us in a tight embrace. The lump in our throats choked back the words we had planned to say. Instead, all we managed was: "Good luck. Stay safe, may God be with you."

Please God, we pray, return him to us unharmed, safe and sound.

Family helps to enrich lives in the community

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — At age 19, Dora (not her real name) embarked on life as a foster mother, caring for medically fragile and developmentally delayed children and even adopting one child, Aaron, who has Down syndrome.

Though she finds her career rewarding, it is often difficult for her to ensure that her son is included with other children in the community.

"I totally love what I'm doing. Right now I'm just having trouble with the government. They don't understand how the disabled can function in the community. The disabled are still being discriminated against."

Dora, now 43, says that ever since kindergarten, she's been having trouble keeping Aaron, now 10, included in regular classrooms in the public school system.

"My son is the love of my life, but as he gets older it becomes more difficult to keep him from being segregated. I'm constantly advocating on his behalf."

Dora says that Jewish schools are no better at embracing children with special needs and including them in regular classrooms.

"If you want the inclusion component, it's hard to find a Jewish day school that will be accommodating. They say it's too expensive, but it's like that in all religious communities."

While Aaron is involved in Special Olympics swimming and bowling, Dora says it's important for her son to be around "normal" children.

"Social skills are important," says Dora, but if he's excluded, Aaron will be unable to absorb these skills from other children, who act as role models.

That's why Dora turned to Extend-a-Family, a government-funded organization that, for the past 25 years, has brought special needs children together with "buddies" in the community.

"I spoke to them about finding a big brother for Aaron, but there are so few people willing to work with special needs children that you're put on a waiting list."

About 2½ years ago, Extend-a-Family came through for Dora and her son, and brought them together with Richard and Mickey Filler and their three daughters, now aged 6, 5 and 3½.

"I initiated [contact with Extend-A-Family] because I thought it was important to have something to do as a family to be helpful to others," says Richard.

"It was important to have the opportunity for us to learn a lot, and especially for the kids to learn about others with differences.

"Aaron is funny. The kids laugh a lot with him, fight for toys. He's high-functioning, communicates well, plays well. He's very athletic and our girls are too. He keeps up with them," says Richard.

While he admits that other families stop and look at Aaron when they go on excursions, Richard says that "it's normal for my kids to be around people that are different. I want them to be comfortable with that and appreciate it."

The Fillers and Dora agree that Aaron has also benefited from having kids to play with.

"The Fillers have given Aaron another aspect of family life. They have given Aaron a different outlook. And Richard has been a wonderful role model. Because I'm a single mother, it's important that he got that."

As Dora cares for four foster children with demanding needs, she says the Fillers have taken Aaron places she can't.

"The Fillers take Aaron to birthday parties that their kids are invited to and have given him social skills, taught him how to behave and how to adapt to situations."

Aaron could not have gained these skills elsewhere, as Dora admits that Aaron is not invited to birthday parties. In all his life, Dora confides that her son has only been invited to three.

"I'm always thinking about how we might involve Aaron in some of the things my kids do," says Richard. "We've brought him to Purim carnivals, waterparks, birthday parties. Our friends are open and willing to involve Aaron," says Richard, who believes the community has the capacity to absorb more people into its fold.

"We've also been thinking of the other things we can do in the community with Aaron, like volunteering at Baycrest," adds Richard.

"Aaron feels like he's part of a family in action. We don't replace his family – Dora is his foundation. She provides lots of love for him."

But Aaron treats Richard like a surrogate father, making him Father's Day cards when the holiday arrives.

Though Dora says she hasn't had a vacation in 20 years, the Fillers have made her life easier, and no doubt, they have enriched the quality of Aaron's.

Associated gets ready to resume Yiddish classes

TORONTO — Yiddish songs floated through the air in a classroom at Associated Hebrew School's Atkinson Avenue campus last semester.

Some 15 students took part in the first extra-curricular Yiddish class in an elementary Jewish day school.

"We would like it to be part of the curriculum, as it is at CHAT," said teacher Ruth Gerlock, who, with co-worker Naomi Miller-Tureck, leads the class.

The class, which began in January, was financed by the Mary Berman Foundation. Through the efforts of Miller-Tureck, this year's extra-curricular project will be sponsored by the U.S. Fishman Foundation.

"We're hoping that the class will inspire these young girls and boys to develop a love of the language and speak to their parents and grandparents in Yiddish," said Saul Berman, who, with his brother Aaron, runs the foundation. Both Berman and his wife Chana, a teacher at Bialik Hebrew Day School, are board members of Friends of Yiddish.

"We think the class is a success because we teach Yiddish as fun," said Miller-Tureck. "We teach writing and reading Yiddish as well as conversation."

Often the students take part in skits involving simple Yiddish words. One of the class exercises involves counting from one to 20 in Yiddish. The students reel off the numbers, although some have difficulty getting their tongues around dreitzen and firtzen (13 and 14).

Another class exercise has them copying Yiddish words in simple statements made up by the teachers.

"Getting Yiddish to be part of curriculum in Jewish day schools is not easy, but we'll keep working at it," said Berman.

Nicole Foigel, 9, hopes to talk to her great-grandmother Ephima in Yiddish. Until now, they have had no means of communicating with each other.

Howie Freeman, a Grade 3 student, also hopes to speak Yiddish with his grandparents, who were at a class seder during Passover.

The same motivation drives Beverly Hetz, a Grade 4 student.

A voluntary assistant is Yoni Tulchinsky, 18, an Israeli who speaks Yiddish with his parents and attends Vaughan Secondary School.

Yiddish classes resume at Associated in October. Parents who want their children to take part in the extra-curricular class can call Ruth Gerlock at 905-881-2652.

CORRECTION

In the obituary of Meyer Nurenberger (CJN, Aug. 23), we reported that when Nurenberger pleaded with his family to leave Europe because he saw the writing on the wall, he never saw them again. In fact, although he lost many aunts, uncles and cousins, his immediate family was in London during World War II and survived. He still has two sisters living in New York.

In addition, it was at the Nuremberg trials in Germany that Nurenberger wore a huge skullcap and held a Yiddish newspaper up high, in order to send the message, "We are still here."

The CJN regrets the errors.

Burton gears up for...Passover!

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As we all prepare for the High Holy Days, Elise Burton is gearing up for Passover.

Burton, 30, is director of the Passover Food Drive for the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section, a full-time job from August until after Passover.

Working in the Jewish community is a natural progression for Burton who has done volunteer work since she was a student at Leo Baeck Day School.

"Volunteerism is part of what was taught there, and tzedakah and tikkun olam was always part of my home. I led a privileged life growing up, and my parents wanted me to understand how lucky I was. They instilled in me a sense of giving back."

After graduating from York University, she says, she decided to take her community work a step further and entered the graduate program in Jewish Communal Service from Brandeis University.

Her professional internships at school included running a dating service at Hillel for Jewish students and professionals, running an intergenerational program, and working in the cultural arts department at the Jewish Community Centre.

"They were good experiences and they left a great impact on me, but I always intended on coming home."

Her first communal job in Toronto was working on Israel at 50. "I came in on the ground floor and I watched something being created. It was very rewarding."

She then worked in her family's business for a while and worked for a secular social service agency, but always intended to come back to the Jewish community.

"I get a different feeling working here. The concept of helping others is very strong. It is pervasive, and it is more ingrained here than in the secular community."

When she heard about this job, she says, she knew it was a good fit for her. "At my interview, I told Terry [Winston, the executive director] about my dog, a Havanese. She jumped up and showed me a picture of her dogs. They were the same breed. I knew then that the job was bashert."

In preparation for this year's campaign, she says, she has put together a committee and is in the processing of finding someone to chair it. "I'm also going through all the files and learning everything I possibly can about the food drive.

Elise Burton is getting ready for Pesach.

"What started as a grassroots project that provided immigrants with the staples for Passover, has expanded and evolved into a community-wide service. We receive referrals from all over the city. We also feed homeless Jews, and we work with chaplains to provide food for Jews in jails."

Gathering food for a Passover drive is more challenging than a regular food drive, she says. "For most drives, people go into their pantries and pull out the food they have not used. Passover food, however, has to be from the current year. Donors actually have to go out and purchase the food."

It is not, however, just a matter of feeding the poor, she says.

"We provide candles, wine, and an English or Russian Hagaddah for people who might not be capable of preparing for the holiday on their own. It may be a homebound senior who wants the ritual, or single students who are living alone.

"We want these people to keep a sense of religion. We make it possible for people not only to obvserve Passover, but to celebrate it. We see it as tikkun olam. We are healing the world in any way we can."

Playwright Adam Pettle currently working on two new plays

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Adam Pettle, the author of Zadie's Shoes, has been commissioned by Theatre Direct Canada to write a play which has elements in it similar to the Matti Baranovski murder.

Matti Baranovski

Baranovski, a 15-year-old Russian Jew, was kicked to death in G. Ross Lord park in December 1999 by three young men after an argument over cigarettes and money. One of the suspects, Daniel Weiz, 20, an Israeli soldier, has been brought to Canada from Israel to face trial in the fall. Two other 17-year-old suspects are to be tried in adult court.

The play, as yet unnamed, currently has only two characters in it. A 10-minute excerpt was presented to a standing room only crowd at the recent Tarragon Spring Arts Fair with these two characters, a Russian Jewish youth, who talked about his life in Canada, and a young Israeli soldier, previously on leave in Toronto, now brought back to Toronto from Israel to face a charge in connection with the death of a Russian teenager. The two actors perfomed monologues, not speaking to each other for the full ten minutes.

Though the similarities are clear, Pettle says his play is not a recounting of the actual event.

"I was much affected by the Baranovski story, but my play is not about it, though it has similar elements," he says.

"I didn't know the Russian boy and I don't know those who have been charged with his murder and I don't want to offend anyone."

The full play will be about 90 minutes, Pettle, a member of the playwright's unit at Tarragon, says.

Pettle's previous play, Zadie's Shoes, was such a hit (the initial run was at the Factory Theatre) that it reopens next March at the Winter Garden theatre as part of the Mirvish subscription series.

In addition, Pettle is one of three Canadian playwrights and three British ones commissioned by the Royal Theatre in Manchester, England, and the Canadian Stage Company to write a play to be produced in both countries. He leaves for England in August on the theatrical exchange.

Pettle has titled this unfinished play, about two brothers, a divorce and a baseball game, Sunday Father.

"Like all my plays, there will be elements of humour in it," he says.

A match made in a kosher café

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — The MentschMatch hotline has been ringing off the hook since Steven Kastner put his speed dating plan into motion.

For the first time in Canada, Orthodox Jews aged 23 to 33 will have the opportunity to participate in a MentschMatch program, which gives registrants the chance to find their soulmate in a quick, efficient and painless manner, says Kastner, who is organizing the Sept. 10 event.

"Many [Orthodox] are married using a matchmaker, but there are many the system doesn't work for," he says.

The traditional system also doesn't work for baalei tshuvah, who were born non-observant but have become observant, "because the matchmaker doesn't know their families," Kastner explains, adding that as a result, these Jews may not have had the opportunity to meet other observant Jews.

MentschMatch works as follows: on the specified date, registrants meet at a kosher café, the name of which is released only upon registration. At the café, each man and woman is sent to sit at a numbered table. They will have seven minutes to talk before switching partners. In total, each participant will meet seven people of the opposite sex that night.

After each encounter, every person checks off "yes" or "no" on their form in response to whether they would like to have a date with that person.

Orthodox speed dating began in New York in 1999, says Kastner, and while some elements of his program are similar, "modifications have been made to my program that have never been tried before."

For instance, unlike in New York, where participants are not called if no match is made, here, "everyone gets a call, even if nobody wants to date you. During the call, you're asked if you want a matchmaker to help you find your soulmate."

A match is made if both the man and woman indicate that they would like a date with each other, and then each of them will be called. "Usually only the man gets called. Here, women will also be contacted and told when to expect a call from the man."

All names and choices on the form are kept strictly confidential. "Not even the person who filled out the form can access the choices they made [afterward]."

Kastner is spreading the word by posting flyers at "kosher establishments and modern Orthodox and baal tshuvah-type synagogues" at cities within driving distance of Toronto.

"We've contacted places in Montreal, Kingston, London and even Buffalo to be sure that participants will meet people they haven't dated before.

"The system is based on being successful for everyone."

Based on the success of the Sept. 10 event, Kastner says he is open to repeating the program for different age brackets and for Conservative, Reform and non-observant Jews.

For more information or to register for MentschMatch, call 905-764-1818, ext. 378.

LEVITT FAMILY TOUR TO PLUNGÉ: Forty-three descendents of the Levitt family of Plungé, Lithuania (Plungyan in Yiddish) made a pilgrimage to the town to take part in a memorial service marking the 60th anniversary of the massacre of the Jews of Plungyan. Participants came from Canada, the United States, England, Scotland, Israel and South Africa. The family held Shabbat services in the town's shul, which has not been used for that purpose since 1940.

Concordia University nixes plans for massive Palestinian rally

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL– A planned anti-Israel rally that organizers claim will attract more than 20,000 people has been delivered a setback after Concordia University denied permission for the event to be based on university land.

Concordia rector Frederick Lowy said the administration was concerned by "the risk of confrontation and possible violence" associated with an event of this size.

The event scheduled for Sept. 15, organized by the campus group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), was to have begun with a "bazaar" on the vacant lot at the corner of Guy Street and de Maisonneuve Boulevard.

Demonstrators were to later march to the United States Consulate on St. Alexandre Street and the Israeli Consulate on René Lévesque Boulevard to denounce "Israeli colonialism." They would then return to the starting point.

In a statement, which he acknowledged may result in some public controversy, Lowy said the land is too small to accommodate so many people.

The lot has a maximum capacity for 2,700 people, Lowy said, and there were worries about "the potential for overcrowding, disruptions and confrontations…

"The university is ultimately responsible for all activities held on its property. The security and safety of participants and the public cannot be assured when so large a rally is planned. For these reasons, the university grounds are not considered to be an appropriate venue for any of the events," he said.

Lowy stressed that the decision was not taken lightly.

"Concordia has always been dedicated to critical thinking and social involvement. More than many universities, Concordia has often been a forum for the peaceful clash of divergent views on both local and international events. That is why it was particularly difficult to make [this] decision."

Lowy related that the Concordia branch of SPHR made a request to use the land on June 20. The university asked for more information, which was received by the dean of students' office Aug. 3.

On Aug. 13, SPHR made additional requests: to hold a rally on the same space for the period from Sept. 13-17 and to hold a teach-in concerning racism and discrimination against Muslim and Arab students at Concordia on either Sept. 5 or 6.

Lowy said the university regrets that SPHR extended invitations to other groups (100, according to the SPHR's Web site) to participate in the rally, and advertised the event widely before securing an agreement with Concordia.

SPHR says the event will take place as scheduled at the same place and that it is "shocked by the unilateral decision" made by the university.

The organization says it believes the decision is politically and perhaps racially motivated, noting that the administration has been "under pressure from pro-Zionist individuals and groups for the past year to rein in Palestinian human rights activity."

The SPHR statement described a contentious meeting it had with dean of students Donald Boisvert over why the university denied its permission. SPHR says it was not given an opportunity to address the administration's concerns before it made its decision.

SPHR maintains that the all-day bazaar, where participating organizations can set up information booths, will not attract more than 2,000 at any given time and will be controlled by security officers. The larger rally, it continues, will take place off university property beginning at 1 p.m.

The SPHR is promoting Sept. 15 as "one of the largest events for the Palestinian cause in North America" and has invited groups from throughout Canada and the United States.

In a letter to members, SPHR said the obstacles put up by the university "will only encourage us to work harder and motivate us even more."

The demonstration is timed to coincide with the 19th anniversary of the Sabra and Shatilla massacre of Palestinians in Lebanon by Christian forces during the Israeli occupation.

Formed two years ago, SPHR has branches at four Montreal universities and says it plans to open a fifth at Carleton University in Ottawa this year. It was particularly forceful in disseminating anti-Israel information at Concordia this past year, and Jewish students have objected that its tactics are confrontational and its material is hateful against Jews.

Hillel Student Society executive director Simon Bensimon said his organization is planning to hold a peaceful demonstration on the McGill campus Sept. 13 to counter the SPHR rally, which is on a Saturday.

Bensimon thinks the projected 15,000 to 20,000 attendance is probably wishful thinking, but Hillel is concerned over what type of rhetoric against Israel and Jews the Palestinian demostrators may use.

Details of the Hillel demonstration are being worked out, but Bensimon said Hillel will have "a positive message. We are in a pro-active, not reactive, mode this year."

The SPHR was behind the campaign this past year to have the Concordia Student Union adopt a resolution on behalf of the university's 20,000 undergraduates, calling on the Canadian government to cut ties with Israel unless it grants Palestinians a state and allows the right of return to all Palestinians.

More recently, it succeeded in getting the post-graduate society of McGill University to condemn Israel for violation of Palestinian rights and, specifically, the closure of Birzeit University.

SPHR says the goal of the Sept. 15 demonstration is to draw attention to "human rights abuses perpetrated by the Israeli occupation force" against Palestinians.

Participants will demand that Canada put pressure on Israel to stop its "violation of international law" and that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon be brought before an international tribunal for war crimes against the Palestinian and Lebanese people.

The SPHR has issued guidelines that there be no racist incitement during the demonstration and that potentially hazardous activities, such as flag burning and provoking police retaliation be avoided.

Mission: Possible

ISRAELNOW AND FOREVER

UJA Past Chairs Set Solidarity Example

More than thirty years of community leadership will be represented on an important mission to Israel next month.

Past chairs of UJA Federation annual campaigns will personally deliver messages of solidarity to the people of Israel as they endure a prolonged period of crisis.

"We want to make a strong statement to the people of Israel that we are and will always be there for them," explains Julia Koschitzky, who is leading the Past Chairs Mission with Leo Goldhar, David Goldstein and Gerry Halbert. Koschitzky also heads the Israel Now Consortium of 50 organizations, led by UJA Federation.

Many of the mission participants headed the annual campaign during pivotal times in Israel's history such as the Six Day War, Yom Kippur War, and Operation Exodus.

The past chairs have also stepped forward together with an unprecedented number of community leaders to take an active role in UJA Federation's crucial Campaign 2002, now underway. Additional funds raised by the Israel Now and Forever Campaign will go towards helping Israel's most vulnerable population cope with the current crisis.

"Visiting Israel is the best way to show we care and to see for ourselves how the people of Israel are coping," notes three-time chair Gerry Halbert. "It is our duty as Jews to witness with our own eyes what Israel is going through to convey their ordeal to the rest of the world."

In addition to briefings by Israeli Defence Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, Knesset Chairman Avrum Burg and former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, the group will meet with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

The 5-day mission will also include visits to Metulla's Canada Centre on Israel's northern border with Lebanon and the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Gilo which has been under heavy attack over the last ten months.

"Israel feels increasingly isolated," explains Rabbi Gunther Plaut, who led the annual campaign in 1970. "If we can breach that in some way, then we have to."

"If we believe in the importance of Israel, then we have to be there with them during the bad times as well as the good," adds 1998-Chair Leo Goldhar.

"This is a crucial time for Jews in the Diaspora to not only reach deep down into their pockets but into their souls to ask themselves what they can do," says Neil Nisker.

"Israel has always been in the forefront of UJA campaigns and this mission reinforces that commitment," adds David Goldstein. "It's easy to write a cheque, but 90% of life is showing up."

Monthly Missions Help Ease Israel's Sense of Isolation

The first two solidarity missions to Israel in what UJA Federation hopes will be a monthly series took to the skies this summer as Torontonians were eager to show Israelis just how much they care.

"This was my first visit to Israel," says participant Sam Steele of his July 8th maiden sojourn. "For some reason I had always put if off. But the current situation compelled me to go. It is crucial for Jews in the Diaspora to show their unity with our brothers and sisters in Israel now. They were so happy to see us there. I challenge every Jew to pick up the phone today and make arrangements to visit Israel."

Steele and his fellow travellers met with a number of Israeli leaders and security officials, in addition to touring neighbourhoods, such as Gilo, affected by violence.

Murray Kideckel shows his solidarity with Israel during the July mission.

Participants also met the Avrahami family whose son was among three Israelis kidnapped by Hizbullah.

Rabbi Phillip Scheim, religious leader of Toronto's B'nai Israel Beth David Congregation, and a seasoned veteran of more than 30 trips to Israel, is encouraged by people taking advantage of these missions.

"Missions such as this one attract a great group of people, people with a deep connection to Israel," says the rabbi.

Participants on the August 13-15 mission visited the Mevasseret Zion Absorption Centre, toured the Green Line and met with Jerusalem's mayor, Ehud Olmert.

"I can't stress enough just how important it is for North American Jews to visit Israel," insisted mission member, Harold Brief. "You could tell just how badly isolated and alone the Israelis feel when everyone from taxi drivers to shopkeepers kept thanking us over and over again for being there. It was actually embarrassing."

"Let's put it this way," adds Past UJA Chair David Goldstein, "every time you speak to someone in Israel over the phone they get such an incredible boost in morale. Just imagine how much more they get when you show up in Israel."

CJA campaign launched in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Dennis Ross, former president Bill Clinton's special envoy to the Middle East, warned that Israel cannot use its military might to force the Palestinians to return to peace negotiations.

"Israel cannot impose peace on the Palestinians. No matter how much pain it inflicts on them, Palestinian aspirations will not go away," said Ross, who was keynote speaker at last week's launch of the 2001 Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA).

Dennis Ross

At the same time, Ross stressed that the Palestinians must realize that violence will not work and has already undone the progress they made toward achieving their national goals.

"The Palestinians are now far from fulfilling their aspirations. They have suffered a great deal – 550 dead, 1,200 wounded, many of whom will never walk again. Their economy is destroyed, they have lost the support of the peace camp in Israel and they have lost a lot of moral legitimacy in the world," said Ross, who left public life this year.

No solution is in sight, he said, and the only course to take now is to defuse the conflict and attempt to restore faith in the peace process. A "limited agreement" that addresses Israel's security needs and the Palestinians' desire for statehood is the most that can be pursued at this point, he said.

Issues like Jerusalem and the return of Palestinians refugees are too contentious for the foreseeable future, he argued.

The launch, attended by 800, was billed as An Evening of Solidarity with Israel. Ross, however, criticized Israel for such actions as demolishing Palestinian homes, setting up road bypasses and extending settlements. Much of the despair and anger expressed by the Palestinians stems from the day-to-day humiliation of living under Israeli control, Ross indicated. Palestinians think Israelis regard them as "subhuman," he said.

The greatest lesson Ross said he learned from his 12 years in Middle East diplomacy was that peace cannot be imposed from the outside either. The United States can't tell either the Israelis or the Palestinians what to do. "The role of the U.S. should be to put ideas on the table... but to stay in the background. Only when there is violence should the U.S. be more prominent."

For the two parties to return to negotiations, Ross said, both have to avoid behaviour "on the ground" that contradicts their stated commitment to peace.

For Israelis, that means not taking actions that give Palestinians a "sense of grievance," and for Palestinians, avoiding the promotion of hostility.

Ross, who played a key role at the Camp David talks, was critical of Palestinian Chairman Yasser Arafat for walking out because he did not get "everything," and for not preparing his people for what they would and would not get from peace.

"I conclude that Arafat can't do a permanent status deal," he said, adding that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is not going to make the concessions [Ehud] Barak was prepared to do.

Ross urged Jews here to make clear to Israelis that they are "with them," and the best way is by visiting the country.

CJA general chair Leanor Segal set this year's goal at $38.6 million, an increase of $1.2 million over 2000. By 2005, she said the Montreal Jewish community must raise $50 million because of increasing local needs and the crisis in Israel.

"For the first time in a generation, Israel is under siege. It is in great danger. The terrorists are intent on winning the war. We must convince them they cannot," she said.

Segal vowed to work to "significantly" raise the amount each community member gives to the campaign. For the first time, as a show of unity, the Sephardi Division did not hold a separate campaign launch, said division chair Armand Afilalo.

The local priorities for the campaign are to alleviate poverty, to increase scholarships to help families struggling to put their children through Jewish day schools, and to provide remedial programs for students having difficulty coping with the demanding curriculum of the day schools, professional development for teachers, and more services for children with special needs.

Spending abroad will focus on helping feed the Jewish poor in Ukraine, subsidizing Jewish summer camps for children and assisting the aliyah of Jews in the former Soviet Union.

More money must be sent to Israel to compensate for the cuts it has had to make in social spending to meet its increase military and security expenditures.

Women's campaign chair Sue Carol Isaacson read an "urgent" appeal from Sharon asking federations in North America to help reduce the impact of Israel's "escalating" defence costs.

Before the start of the launch, about 15 people held a peaceful demonstration across the street from Cummings House, demanding an end to the Israeli occupation of Palestinian land and protesting alleged repression of Palestinians.

"Solidarity with Israel means solidarity with the occupation," said Bruce Katz, spokesperson for Palestinian and Jewish Unity, the organizer of the protest with the Jewish Alliance Against the Occupation.

"This demonstration is our way of letting people know there is dissent in the Jewish community over Israel's policies," Katz said.

"Even More"

A distraught man came to the Bal Shem Tov. "My son is drifting away from Judaism. What shall I do", he pleaded. "You must love him, with all your heart," replied the Besht. A few months later, the same man returned, even more upset. "My son has drifted even further off the path. What must I do now?", he asked, his voice shaking. "You must love him even more," came the calm reply from the Hasidic master.

Ottawa choir takes part in Zimriya choir festival

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — In spite of the tense situation in the Middle East and cancellations by many participants, the Shira Ottawa Choir represented North America at the recent Zimriya choir festival in Jerusalem.

The Zimriya, which has been held in Israel every three years since 1952, attracted more than 1,000 participants from 17 countries in 1998. This year, there were barely half the number of participants, and the Ottawa choir, in existence less than two years, was the only Jewish choir from outside Israel.

Out of 55 choir members, the final contingent consisted of just 15, including accompanist Aviva Lightstone and director Cantor Daniel Benlolo. This reduced number necessitated changes in the choir's arrangements, but did nothing to lessen the enthusiasm of those who attended.

"The calibre of the singing was outstanding," said choir member Edie Landau. "Our program was excellent and we were very well received. We sang in Hebrew, Ladino and French, and the audience loved it."

The Zimriya, which took place from July 29 to Aug. 12, included daily workshops where the choirs were able to learn, teach and share.

"We exchanged music with other choirs as well," said Landau.

Being the smallest choir at the Zimriya, the Shira Ottawa Choir was paired up with a South Korean choir, which consisted of 29 professional singers.

"They had to learn five Hebrew pieces," said Landau. After the workshops, the choirs had to perform what they had learned. The choir directors had their own workshops as well.

The Israelis in the audience were grateful that the choir had come. Choir members, in turn, felt it was important to show solidarity with Israel by their participation.

Asked what the highlight of the experience had been, Landau was hard pressed to answer. "Every day was a highlight," she said. "We all felt it was like a dream that we were there. It was a highlight to mingle with all the different choirs and make connections and friendships. It was emotional for all of us."

Retired businessman offers expertise to those in less developed regions

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — When on an international assignment, retired Winnipeg businessman Morley Globerman notes that being Jewish rarely comes into play.

Globerman, who volunteers with Canadian Executive Services Overseas (CESO), an organization that arranges for retired and semi-retired professionals to act as business consultants to their counterparts in Aboriginal communities in Canada and in less developed countries, says, "My clients know I'm Jewish, but it has never been an issue."

One client in Guatemala, he recalls, asked if it was true that when Jewish boys turn 13, their fathers take them to visit prostitutes. Another client in Honduras, a Palestinian, had a Jewish wife.

"I had a client in Trinidad who was Muslim," Globerman adds. "We would often have theological discussions... The fellow was a modern Muslim who deplored violence and fundamentalists."

Globerman first applied to work with CESO in 1996 after he retired from his family-owned mattress factory.

He is currently away on his 64th assignment, and he is booked until the end of March. His travels for CESO have taken him to the Caribbean, Central and South America, Africa, Southern Asia and Eastern Europe.

In most cases, he says, the client pays the airfare and accomodation. Assignments average four weeks in length, but can be as long as nine weeks.

Before starting out, he says, he took a couple of training courses where he learned a lot about the importance of national differences.

"Quite often, what a client wants and what I think he needs when I get there are quite different," says Globerman. "Many of them want to export, but they lack modern equipment and methods and funding. I try to get across to them that they have to be strong locally before they can sell internationally."

One of the first things he tells clients is that there are two things he doesn't want to hear: 'We didn't have time,' and 'We've always done it this way.'

Globerman has helped a number of companies come close to Western world standards. In Eastern Europe, he notes, profit is a new idea. One client he had in Poland was still operating in the Communist manner.

Globerman says it takes him about 10 days to catch up on correspondence and recover from jetlag when he comes back from an assignment.

After that, he starts getting a little antsy. "The feelings are hard to describe," he says. "It's very rewarding [to get] people to the point where they can sell internationally, and hardly a day goes by when I don't hear from many past clients."

ISRAEL NOW AND FOREVER

Israel is facing its toughest times in decades. That's why the Government of Israel has asked for the assistance of our Jewish community and others around the world. Campaign 2002 is our call to serve Israel at a time of crisis.

With security costs mounting, the Government of Israel has been forced to redirect nearly $700 million U.S. from vital services to pay for increased security costs.

To help shoulder the impact of this transfer of funds Israel has issued an emergency appeal to Jewish Federations across North America, including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, to provide support to those who will be hardest hit by this shortfall.

Increased contributions to UJA Federation Campaign 2002 will allow us to help Israel's most vulnerable at a time of crisis.

This year, through our new Challenge Fund, gift increases will actually multiply to benefit the people of Israel, because every additional dollar donated to Campaign 2002 will be matched by the fund.

Israel has been forced to make painful decisions, reluctantly sacrificing funds for social services, in order to protect our Jewish State. It has no choice and neither do we.

UJA Federation Campaign 2002 is dedicated to the people of Israel at this critical point in history. Israel is calling. It's time to answer.

Gitelman's 'aces' in world of bridge

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Fred Gitelman showing his hand.

For 10 consecutive days at least three times a year, Fred Gitelman taps reservoirs of strength and endurance that might ordinarily be associated with triathletes or marathon runners.

He sleeps very little and eats even less. Operating on nervous energy, he manages somehow to keep body and soul together long enough to get him through the ordeal. He's not exactly sure how he does it, but some subconscious force marshals his bodily energy for the 10 days, so that on day 11 he's able to let it all go, relax and lie down for a good rest that might last a week.

Feature

Although not a professional athlete, Gitelman has been a professional in the elite world of competitive bridge for about 10 years, since he vaulted onto the international bridge scene with a second place showing in the world junior championships.

Since then, Gitelman has amassed a record worthy of his reputation as one of the top bridge players in the world. He was part of a six-man team that in 1995 represented Canada in the Open World Championships in China, where Canada finished second, its best-ever showing; he's placed first in the North American championships in San Francisco; and he's ventured onto the pro circuit, where wealthy American amateurs pay him US $1,000 a day to play as their partner.

He and his regular partner, Brad Moss of New York, make periodic trips to Las Vegas where they enter cash tournaments, rarely dropping below the top 10 and often taking top honours. Earlier this year Gitelman returned home from a tournament with US $10,000 in prize money.

In local bridge circles, Gitelman may be considered the sultan of slams and the baron of bidding. His renown has travelled far and wide, thanks in part to his other area of interest, computer software. A mostly self-taught computer programmer, Gitelman has combined his passion for bridge with his knowledge of code to author educational bridge software that he markets to the game's aficionados. One of his instructional CDs came to the attention of financial guru Warren Buffett,who one day seven years ago phoned him out of the blue to inquire if he had any other programs he could use to improve his game. After giving his sales shpiel, and making the sale, Gitelman asked Buffett for his advice on improving his company's business prospects.

Better than that, Buffett sent Gitelman's CD to his friend, Bill Gates Sr., who in turn passed it along to his son, Bill Gates Jr., him of Microsoft fame.

Both must have been impressed by the software, because awhile later, Gitelman received a phone call inviting him to join Gates; Buffett and another high-power executive in a bridge game on board a chartered train that was taking Gates and Buffett on a luxury vacation from Alaska to California. He boarded the train on a stopover in Montana and spent the next two days playing as Gates' partner. "We got along well and I gave them useful instruction," Gitelman recalls.

Since then, he's teamed up with Gates at various tournaments, and the two were scheduled to play a game on the Internet last weekend. They're also slated to play together in a tournament next December in Palm Springs.

Gitelman considers Gates a friend – if not exactly a bosom buddy – and the two have a lot in common. Both are adept computer programmers, both run their own software companies and both love the game of bridge. Gates, however, walks around with a little more pocket money than Gitelman.

Gates, Gitelman says, has a good deal of natural ability and fire for the game. He could become a world class player if he devoted more time to it. Buffett, by contrast, is a good social player.

While he has helped Buffett and Gates improve their knowledge of bridge, the two star students have reciprocated by helping raise the game's profile. It's sort of like having Tiger Woods endorse your clothing line or Wayne Gretzky support your brand of cereal.

Bridge, Gitelman said, suffers from an image and marketing problem. "People see it as something older people play in smoke-filled rooms where they yell at each other," Gitelman said. In reality, "anyone can play. It's fun and it's challenging."

Still, he acknowledges most good players are getting close to retirement age. At the recent north American championships, held in Toronto's Royal York Hotel, the average age of the 10,000 competitors was between 60 and 65, and they've been playing for about 40 years each, he said.

Gitelman, 36, wants to expose younger people to the game. Along with his partner, Sheri Winestock, he's created a Web site (www.bridgebase.com) with free downloadable learn-to-play program and other bridge-related features.

"I'm hopeful I'm making the game learnable through software and the Internet," he said.

Their company, Bridge Base Inc., carries a line of 15 instructional CDs, but Bridge Master 2000 is the most popular. It is available at bridge clubs and by mail order.

Gitelman, who has been dabbling with computers since the days his 8K Commodore Pet was the Ferrari of personal computers, wrote all the code for the CDs. He's brought the competitive fires he developed in bridge to the business world. "Now, I want to be the best bridge programmer in the world, to be successful and to make bridge a more popular game," he said.

He's itching to win a world championship and recognizes that he's not likely to do so in Canada. The second place finish in 1995 surprised almost everybody, including the Canadian contingent, which was five-sixths Jewish. Everything fell into place for the team that year, and since then, they haven't come close to duplicating their achievement. Furthermore, the team has gotten older and there isn't any young blood available to make Canada a contender in the near future, Gitelman said.

With his peak playing years around the corner – most top players are between 35 and 45, he said – he's considering a move south of the border – North Carolina sounds nice – where he would take up U.S. residence and qualify to compete for the United States in an international tournament.

The move isn't imminent but it's something he's been mulling over for some time.

If he decides to go, Canada's hope for a world championship will be that much farther from reality.

Cabinet shuffle likely in December

Will he or won't he? As the Liberal caucus meets in Alberta, the question everyone is pondering right now is whether the prime minister will shuffle his cabinet, and if so, when will he do it?

The truth is, your guess is as good as ours. Political leaders – even the most calculating – often determine a course of action on the basis of a seemingly trivial or petty consideration. It is widely believed that the prime minister stuck around for the last election only because he was upset at a meeting arranged by Martinites in Toronto on the eve of the last Liberal convention.

However, in an effort to share some of the important considerations that would likely factor into his decision, we thought it would be fun to present the following scenario.

The Liberals are poised to win over Alberta during the caucus retreat. An announcement about a $120-million research facility going to the University of Alberta will open the show. Rumours have moved beyond idle speculation concerning the candidates being recruited by the Liberals for the next election – including the popular, charismatic former Calgary chief of police, Christine Silverberg, who is likely to run in the byelection this year after Preston Manning resigns.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

While the Tories, NDP and Alliance flounder, similar efforts at rehabilitating the Liberal presence out west are under way in British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Thus, the prime minister, the only one who makes decisions about cabinet, has to balance several competing issues.

First, he has to decide whether he is sufficiently tempted by the current political landscape to take a run at an unprecedented fourth consecutive majority government. It's tempting because he knows he can do it. But for a variety of reasons, let's assume that he will call it quits before the next election.

Then, he has to consider how he can most effectively control his caucus – and those frisky leadership hopefuls – until he exits 24 Sussex Dr. following the G-8 scheduled for, yup, Alberta next year. The only effective way to ensure discipline is by keeping everyone on their toes. Those already in cabinet will behave because they want to stay in cabinet. Those who want to get into the inner sanctum will not cross the PM for fear of blowing their chance for the prestige, power and privileges of cabinet membership.

All of this points to the PM passing over the national caucus as an opportunity for a shuffle. Our best bet is that the PM will have moved beyond a preoccupation with an election and will want to be remembered as the Liberal leader who facilitated reconciliation with the western provinces. He can only do that if he signals an intention to leave. And he can only leave the Liberal party secure if he provides enough time for his successor to establish his or her imprint on the job. So look to December as a likely time for a shuffle, leaving ample time for the contenders to position themselves for the future race.

We cannot guarantee the date a picture will appear. Please limit all greetings to 25 typewritten words. We reserve the right to edit all items and condense any that are longer than that.

Holiday Food Ideas

L'Shanah Tovah

from

The Canadian Jewish News

The High Holy Days are a time of looking forward to the new year, and just as importantly, of reflecting on years past.

Traditions play a prominent role in our celebration of the holidays, and the customs of our parents, grandparents and even great-grandparents are never far away as we prepare for the yamim tovim.

Among our traditions, we pray to God to inscribe us in the Book of Life for the coming year, we throw bread crumbs into a body of water to symbolically cast away our sins, and we blow the shofar during the synagogue services as an expression of God's sovereignty.

We also eat traditional foods to symbolize our hope for a sweet and prosperous new year. We dip apples in honey, we bake round challah that represents the never-ending circle of life, and we eat pomegranates whose seeds represent a new year filled with many mitzvot.

In this year's CJN food pages we have sought out recipes that incorporate some of these traditional foods. Some recipes are lightened up, slimmed down versions of old favourites, some are just like the ones our grandmothers made, and still others are recipes that can put an elegant and festive touch to our holiday tables.

Whichever recipes you choose and however you celebrate the holidays, we hope you will spend your time celebrating with family and friends, and remembering those who have brought their traditions to our tables.

From all of us at The CJN we wish you Shanah Tovah.

–CB

Research makes this more than a cookbook

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

When Hana Lustigova Greenfield returned to her native Czechoslovakia in 1945 after liberation from Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, she found her sister and her rabbi. He was preparing the synagogue for Rosh Hashanah. He had the sisters slice an apple and dip it in honey, telling them, "As bitter as was our past life, we should have a sweet future."

This is just one of hundreds of stories in The Foods of Israel Today, the latest book by Joan Nathan, the award-winning author of Jewish Cooking in America and host of the PBS TV series of the same name.

More than a cookbook, it is an exhaustively researched and compellingly told saga of a vibrant land and its diverse people, from its rich ancient history through its beleaguered present.

Nathan is a fearless investigator and a good listener. She gained entry into the kitchens of both ordinary Israelis and popular restaurants, gathering stories as well as recipes.

"I couldn't write the book now," says Nathan. "It would be very difficult. I went to places I couldn't go to today, and people couldn't have been nicer to me."

While working in the early '70s as a foreign press attache for the mayor of Jerusalem, Teddy Kollek, she noticed how cooler heads prevailed when disputes were settled over a shared meal. "Food became a means of breaking down political and ethnic barriers," she notes.

Having grown up in Rhode Island in an Ashkenazi home, Nathan quickly became intoxicated with the new flavours of Israel. "Rosh Hashanah always meant chicken and matzah balls and apples dipped in honey. Then I went to Israel and it blew my mind. I remember going to a Yemenite home for Rosh Hashanah and thinking – where's the apples and honey? They had pomegranate. In Israel, there are all these different taste sensations. That's what got me interested in writing about food."

Out of that experience came Nathan's first cookbook, The Flavor of Jerusalem, with Judy Stacey Goldman, and now, 25 years later, with The Foods of Israel Today she has come full circle.

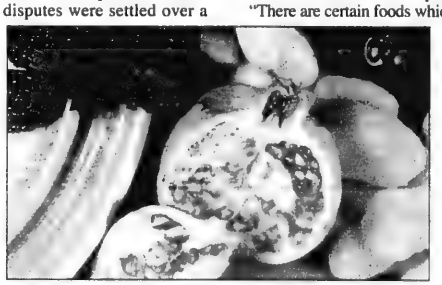
When Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated in 1995, Nathan decided to memorialize the slain leader by capturing the "dynamic spirit of Israel... through the medium I knew best – food and culinary traditions.

"I wanted to show the richness of Israel's past and present through its many cuisines."

Note, she says, "many cuisines," not "Israeli cuisine." The melting pot ideal envisioned by David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, never came to pass, Nathan tells us. Instead of a blend of 90 nationalities and diverse cultures and religions into a cohesive identity, she says the cuisine of Israel is a "multicultural mosaic."

"There is a link to ancient Israel that is showing itself in food," says Nathan. "It is becoming Israeli, but it is not Israeli. I don't think it will ever be, quote, a cuisine.

"There are certain foods which to me seem Israeli. Mediterranean ingredients, for example. If you go to a Sephardi restaurant, you'll have a Libyan this and a Moroccan that. Israelis are taking the best of immigrant foods and incorporating them."



Pomegranates, a favourite in Yemenite homes

Much has changed in Israel in the decades between her two books.

"When I lived in Israel, you rarely went to restaurants except for falafel stands or cafes."

Now this tiny nation, where, Nathan says, more cookbooks are being written per capita than in almost any other country, is competing internationally with its foie gras, olive oil, fine cheeses and wines.

"Today Israeli chefs are going to culinary schools around the world, coming back and using local ingredients."

And Nathan's enthusiasm for those ingredients is contagious. "I particularly love bulgur and frika, the parched wheat mentioned in the book of Ruth, chick peas in so many dishes, pomelos, and, oh, the figs in Israel are the best in the world. They're so fabulous, literally sunkissed."

The saga Nathan tells of the survival of Israel's native foods is almost as compelling as that of its people, from the seven original ingredients mentioned in Deuteronomy (barley, wheat, figs, dates, pomegranates, olives and grapes), to the harrowing tale of the introduction of 7,000 smuggled Iraqi date saplings, to the decimation by lice of the grape vines planted by Baron Edmond de Rothschild.

But it is the stories of ordinary people that are the real heart of the book. Like the Kurdish great-grandmother, married at 14, who makes 60 kubbeh (semolina and bulgur dumplings) for her family each week, sitting cross-legged on a blanket, a telephone at hand.

"I love seeing these very simple people taking pride in their cooking that a lot of us who are so sophisticated just don't have.For the holidays and Shabbat, people aren't the way we are, all over the place. They're together as families."

ISRAELI CARROT SALAD

If there were a signature Israeli dish, it would be carrot salad.

2 cloves garlic
8 sprigs (1/2 bunch) fresh parsley, stems removed
1 lb. carrots, peeled
2 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tbsp. orange juice
4 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1/2 tsp. salt
several grinds of pepper

Place the garlic and the parsley in the bowl of a food processor equipped with steel blade and chop or julienne. Add the carrots, lemon juice, orange juice, and salt and pepper. Pulse until the carrots are well chopped but not puree. Adjust the seasonings and serve. Note: You can add orange slices and/or radish slices to garnish this salad. Add a grated or julienned celery root with the carrots in winter. Yield: 6 servings.

BOULETTES DE POISSONS MOROCCAN FISH BALLS

3 lbs. whiting, cod, haddock, or whitefish fillets
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
1 small onion, diced
8 cloves garlic, crushed
1 large egg, lightly beaten
2 tsp. cumin
1/4 tsp. mace
1/4 cup vegetable oil
2 large tomatoes, peeled and diced
2 carrots, peeled and cut into tiny rounds
1 orange or red bell pepper, diced in 1/2-inch pieces
2 tsp. hot paprika
2 heaping tbsp. chopped fresh cilantro
1 tsp. salt
1 cup water

Chop the fish with the parsley and the onion, using a grinder or a food processor fitted with a steel blade. Add 4 cloves of the garlic, egg, cumin and mace to the fish, mixing well with your hands. Refrigerate for about an hour.

Heat the oil in a nonstick frying pan with a cover and add the tomatoes and the remaining garlic. Cook for a few minutes, then mash the tomatoes with a fork. Add to the pan the carrots, peppers, paprika, and cilantro. Sprinkle on the salt, add the water, and simmer, covered, for about 15 minutes, adding more water if the mixture becomes too dry.

Mould the chilled fish mixture into balls the size of walnuts and place in the sauce, adding more water if needed, just to cover the fish. Cook for 25 minutes, stirring occasionally. Serve the fish balls immediately, covered with the sauce, or refrigerate and serve later at room temperature. Yield: 40 balls, serving about 10 people.

It's hard to believe that summer is rapidly drawing to a close and the High Holy Days are just around the corner. When I asked my culinary Internet friends for their favourite holiday dishes, I received several recipes for brisket and cabbage rolls. There were a few recipes for chicken, turkey and salmon, but beef was definitely the top choice. When it comes to preparing for the holidays, meat still takes centre stage.

Meat dishes are excellent for the busy cook because they can be prepared in advance and frozen successfully. If you click on www.jewishfood-list.com, you will find 16 recipes for brisket and seven recipes for cabbage rolls, including a variation for unstuffed cabbage if you're too busy to roll your own!

Wendy Baker of New York wrote: "There are several things I always make ahead for most holidays. Chicken soup can be made well ahead and frozen. My caramelized brisket (the recipe is in the archives) also freezes well, but if you don't want to freeze it, can still be made a few days ahead and kept in the refrigerator. I find that honey cake freezes well.

"Apple or other fruit pies freeze well if frozen unbaked. They can be baked without thawing, by putting them in the oven right from the freezer and they taste as good as never frozen ones.

"Challah, if you bake your own, also can be made well ahead and frozen. I generally make a whole bunch of fairly small challot and freeze them for the whole month of holidays. If you have a decent bakery, this is something that you can buy and save that fuss if time is short."

Here are some traditional dishes that my friends near and far will be enjoying with family and friends at their tables for the upcoming High Holy Days. Enjoy!

CITRUS ROASTED CHICKEN

An updated version from Nathan's first cookbook The Flavor of Jerusalem.

5 lb. roasting chicken
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
1 whole orange, well washed handful of fresh herbs, such as rosemary, sage, and thyme, plus extra mixed herbs for garnish
4 cloves garlic
1/2 cup fresh orange juice
1 tsp. ground ginger
4-6 tbsp. honey
1/2 cup white wine

Preheat oven to 375. Sprinkle the chicken inside and out with salt and pepper. Insert the whole orange, the herbs and the garlic in the cavity of the chicken, truss closed, and place in a roasting pan, breast side down. Mix the orange juice and ground ginger and pour the mixture over the chicken. Roast, uncovered, for half an hour.

Remove the chicken from the oven, turn it over, smear the outside with the honey, and pour the wine over it. Return the chicken to the oven. After 5 minutes, baste with the juice from the roasting pan. If the breast seems to be browning too quickly, cover it with foil. Basting occasionally, roast until the drumstick moves easily, about 45 to 60 minutes more. Remove the orange, the herbs and the garlic, and place the chicken on a serving platter. Slice the orange and scatter around the chicken and garnish with the additional herbs. Yield: 6 to 8 servings.

ROSH HASHANAH APPLE TORTE

From Czech Holocaust survivor, Hana Lustigova Greenfield.

2 cups unbleached all-purpose flour
1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
1 large egg
3/4 cup (1 1/2 sticks) unsalted butter or margarine, cut into small pieces
1 cup sugar
grated zest of 1 lemon
6 medium (about 3 lbs.) Granny Smith or other flavourful apples, peeled and cored
1/2 tsp. cinnamon

Put the flour, baking powder, salt, egg, butter or margarine, 3/4 cup of the sugar, and the lemon zest in the bowl of a food processor fitted with a steel blade. Process until a soft dough is formed. Remove and roll the dough in flour, then cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate for about 20 minutes.

Meanwhile, coarsely grate the apples in a food processor fitted with a grating blade or use the large holes of a hand grater. Toss with the remaining 1/4 cup sugar and set aside in a colander to drain for 30 minutes. Add the cinnamon.

Preheat oven to 450. Take 2/3 of the dough and with floured fingertips, press it lightly into the bottom and 2 inches up the sides of a 9-inch springform pan. Spoon the apple mixture evenly into the dough shell. Roll out the remaining dough to a 9-inch circle, about 1/8-inch thick, and place on top of the apples, crimping the edges of the dough together to seal them. Make a few holes in the top of the cake with the tines of a fork.

Bake on the middle rack of the oven for 15 minutes. Reduce the heat to 350 and bake for 30 minutes more or until golden brown. Yield: 8 to 10 servings.

in the past for the holidays. It has been adopted by friends and colleagues from work in the past, with great success. It is a super recipe, which I received from my friend Ani Stern, who got it from her Hadassah friends."

Ani Stern's story is fascinating. She is the owner of the notebook of recipes In Memory's Kitchen, handwritten in German and Czech by a group of women interned in the Theresienstadt concentration camp. Many years later, the notebook was brought to Ani from someone who had received it from someone else who was in Theresienstat and to whom Ani's mother, Mrs. Pachter, entrusted the notebook to deliver it to Ani in Palestine. Dalia Carmel was the catalyst in getting the manuscript published in 1996. She was credited by the director of the Holocaust Museum in Washington as performing "a great mitzvah."

DALIA'S BRISKET WITH CRANBERRY SAUCE

3 to 5 lbs. brisket, trimmed of as much fat as possible
1 can of light beer
16 oz. can whole cranberry sauce
1 pkg. onion soup mix
½ cup chili sauce or ketchup
2 onions, sliced
1 large bunch of parsley
5 cloves garlic, peeled (do not chop) pepper and red pepper flakes, to taste

In a bowl, mix the beer, cranberry sauce, onion soup mix and chili sauce or ketchup. Mix well. In a heavy pot that can hold the brisket flat, spread the onions and parsley on the bottom, then throw in the garlic. Place the brisket on top and pour the liquid mixture on top.

Rub the meat with the liquid mixture, then with the pepper and red pepper flakes.

Preheat oven to 350 and cook for an hour. Turn the meat over and cook for another 30 to 60 minutes. If the meat is not tender yet, let it cook for another 30 to 60 minutes. When done, let it all cool. Store the brisket separately from the sauce. Refrigerate overnight.

The next morning, remove the fat from the sauce. Before serving, slice the meat into serving pieces. Blend the sauce into a smooth sauce with a hand blender or in the blender. Place slices in a Pyrex casserole, pour the sauce over the slices and reheat.

Bring to the table and serve with mashed potatoes, rice or couscous. Perfect with creamed spinach, carrot salad and cucumber salad. Makes 6 to 12 servings.

It's a winner! Our two older children who are now vegetarians still remember the taste of this gravy, and our youngest son always asks if I have cooked brisket."

BARBARA'S BRISKET

5 lbs. beef brisket, preferably first cut
3 large onions, chopped
6 cloves garlic, crushed
salt, freshly ground black pepper and paprika to taste

The Web: a world of food delights

½ cup ketchup
¼ cup steak sauce
½ cup chili sauce
¼ cup wine vinegar
2½ cups water (or more if needed)

Preheat oven to 375. Place ⅔ of the onions and garlic on the bottom of a large roasting pan. Rub meat all over with salt, pepper and paprika. Place meat fat side up on the bed of onions and garlic. Cover with additional onions and garlic. Combine ketchup, steak sauce, chili sauce, wine vinegar and water; pour over the meat.

Cover the roasting pan with foil or a lid and roast for 3 hours, or until fork tender. Check while cooking, adding more water if necessary.

Separate meat and gravy and put gravy in the blender to incorporate the onions. Allow meat to cool, slice and put it back in the gravy. Gravy may also be chilled to remove the fat. Makes 10 to 14 servings.

This tasty recipe for tongue comes from Leah Perez of Montreal, who usually serves it as a side dish along with another meat or poultry dish. Leah wrote: "I learned how to make this from my Moroccan friend, Rutie, years ago. The last time I made it, the 'I don't eat tongue' people tasted it and were actually surprised! Too bad, because by then there was hardly any left."

LEAH'S TONGUE WITH MUSHROOMS

1 large beef tongue (or 2 veal tongues)
1 tbsp. oil
3 or 4 sliced garlic cloves
salt and pepper to taste
⅛ to ¼ tsp. turmeric
fresh chopped parsley (about ½ a bunch)
8 oz. sliced fresh mushrooms
½ cup water (about)

Boil tongue until tender, about 2 to 3 hours, depending on size. Peel and let cool. When cool, slice tongue into thin slices.

Heat oil in a large frying pan. Add garlic and saute on medium heat for 2 minutes. Add tongue slices and brown lightly. Season with salt, pepper and turmeric. Add parsley and mushrooms. Cook 3 or 4 minutes longer. Add water and cook until mushrooms are cooked through. Makes 6 to 8 servings as a side dish.

Judy Sobel of Atlanta wrote: "This is my late mother-in-law's recipe for stuffed cabbage. It is quite different as it has no addition to the filling – just beef. The sweet and sour sauce is exceptional and I use it for other dishes. When I prepare this, I always make meatballs along with it for the kids. I haven't seen another recipe that calls for adding flanken. It is better when made in advance and chilled so fat can be removed easily and the flavours can blend. It freezes beautifully. My family likes it in mini-portions in grape leaves, served warm as an appetizer.

Leftover sauce can be frozen and used for meatballs or even chicken fricassee. It is necessary to experiment with the sugar and sour salt to get just the right taste. Go easy on the sour salt!"

ROSE SOBEL'S CABBAGE ROLLS (PRAAKES) WITH FLANKEN

2 large heads of cabbage
3 lb. flanken (short ribs)
2 tbsp. oil
3 lb. lean ground beef
1 tbsp. garlic powder
2 tsp. salt
2 tsp. pepper
3 large onions, sliced
1 large can of tomato paste
1 cup hot water (approximately)
2 tbsp. sugar
2 tsp. sour salt (citric acid)

Pomegranates–the versatile fruit

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

On Rosh Hashanah, the pomegranate (rimon) is one of the signs used to beseech God that He judge our merits to be as plentiful as the seeds of the rimon. According to tradition, the rimon has 613 seeds, corresponding to the number of mitzvot.

The pomegranate was one of the important plants in the time of the Mishnah and Talmud, and details about it abound. Various species were grown, both sweet and sour. They were cultivated throughout the Middle East and North Africa, eventually winning the greatest favour in France. Brought to America by European settlers, they are now grown primarily in California.

Pomegranates resemble nothing else on produce stands. The pomegranate's leathery red to pink to yellow skin with a parchment-like texture houses a tangy-sweet flesh bursting with juice. It is actually a collection of hundreds of tiny whole fruits, separated into clusters by a yellowish-white membrane. The shiny seeds have a translucent pulp that gives them an appealing sweet-tart flavour.

Good-quality pomegranates will be large, firm, smooth-skinned and heavy for their size. The colouring will be an even deep red and there will be few blemishes. Numerous brown or scarred areas on the skin or soft spots indicate an old product. Small fruit will mean smaller, less juicy seeds with more waste.

The rich, red seeds are the edible part of the fruit. Removing the juicy seeds can be a time intensive task. Here's one method: Slice off the stem. Make four cuts through the skin, each starting at the exposed stem end and meeting at the opposite end. Break the fruit into quarters. Remove the seeds from each quarter with your fingers. You may find it helpful to immerse the rimon in water to dig out the seeds – the seeds will sink.

You can keep whole pomegranates at room temperature away from sunlight for up to a week. For longer storage, remove seeds and store in plastic bags in the refrigerator, where they'll keep for three days. Pomegranates can be "shelled" several days in advance and kept refrigerated in a sealed jar. The juice can be extracted by placing chunks of the fruit in a food processor, whirring, and then straining shell, membranes, and seeds.

Seeds can be frozen in a single layer on a cookie sheet until firm and then packed in freezer containers and stored for up to six months. Remove only those seeds you need. Pomegranate juice keeps up to five days in the refrigerator. Freeze up to six months in airtight containers.

Pomegranate seeds can decorate salads, fruit desserts, cakes and puddings. They can garnish rice dishes, pancakes, waffles and ice cream sundaes. The juice can be used as a marinade or glaze for chicken or lamb.

CHICKEN WITH POMEGRANATES AND WALNUTS

2½-lb.-3 lb. chicken
4 tbsp. olive oil, divided
½ tsp. dried thyme
½ tsp. pepper
1 large onion, diced
2 tbsp. tomato paste
2 cups walnuts, finely chopped
3½ cups water
½ tsp. cinnamon
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1 cup fresh pomegranate juice
1-2 tbsp.sugar (if necessary)

Trim chicken of excess fat and cut into eighths. Heat 2 tbsp. olive oil in a large, heavy skillet over medium-high heat. Add thyme and pepper.

Brown chicken, turning with tongs, until golden brown on all sides. Remove from heat and set aside.

Heat remaining 2 tbsp. olive oil in a separate, large skillet over medium-high heat. Saute onions, stirring constantly, for 4-5 minutes. Add tomato paste and continue to saute for a few minutes.

Lower heat to medium. Add walnuts and saute for about 5 minutes, stirring constantly. Add water, cinnamon, lemon juice and pomegranate juice. Reduce heat to low and cover skillet. Cook for half an hour.

Correct seasoning; add sugar if sauce is too tart. Carefully arrange chicken pieces in sauce. Cover and simmer for 20-25 minutes or until chicken tests done. Yield: 4-8 servings.

A world of food delights

dark green leaves. Use the rest for other cabbage dishes (e.g., cole slaw or steamed cabbage). Turn each leaf over and carefully slice the thick vein parallel to the leaf. (This makes them more flexible and easier to roll.)

In a large Dutch oven or heavy pot, brown the flanken on low heat in a little oil. Meanwhile, mix the ground beef with garlic powder, salt and pepper. Take about ¼ cup of meat mixture and roll it into an oval.

Place in the middle of the cabbage leaf and fold over sides of leaf.

Bring up the bottom of the leaf and roll up very tightly. If you have sliced off the vein, you won't need string or toothpicks to hold it together.

Place cabbage rolls in a layer over the flanken. When you have a tightly packed layer, add ⅓ of the sliced onions and ⅓ of the tomato paste.

Repeat until cabbage leaves are used up. You should have leftover ground beef. Make small meatballs and add to pot. End with the onions and tomato paste. Add a cup of hot water. Sprinkle with sugar and sour salt, cover pan and simmer on low heat for 1½ hours, or until everything is cooked and tender.

Remove the cabbage and meatballs to a serving dish or a freezer-safe container. Remove bones from flanken and discard. Cut meat into serving size pieces, trim off any fat and add to cabbage rolls. Taste the sauce and adjust with either sugar or sour salt. (Add sour salt sparingly.)

Pour sauce over cabbage rolls and either freeze or serve. (I like to freeze it first so I can remove the hardened fat.) Makes 8 or more servings.

Fry, Cotler to attend conference in Durban

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Federal multiculturalism minister Hedy Fry and Jewish member of Parliament Irwin Cotler will head Canada's delegation to the controversial World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance (WCAR), taking place in Durban, South Africa from Aug. 31 to Sept. 7.

Also slated to attend from the government is Toronto-area MP Jean Augustine, a powerful voice on behalf of African-Canadians.

The United Nations-sponsored conference has galvanized world Jewry. Arab countries have bucked Western-led counter-efforts and succeeded in reviving anti-Israel canards by placing the Zionism-equals-racism issue on the conference's agenda [CJN, Aug. 23].

Draft resolutions also refer to Israeli policies regarding Palestinians as "holocausts" and "ethnic cleansing." Most observers agree that unless such vitriol is expunged or tempered, the conference will deteriorate into a week-long orgy of Israel-bashing.

Cotler, the MP for Mont-Royal, told The CJN before leaving for Durban that he fears the conference will undercut the struggle against racism, compromise the integrity of the UN and even harm the Mideast peace process.

"The draft is far more pernicious than 'Zionism equals racism.' It is a country-specific indictment that promotes hatred and contempt."

Participants say the broadsides expected in Durban may denigrate Zionism as racism, accuse Israel of being an apartheid state, exclude anti-Semitism from the various forms of racism, minimize the Holocaust as merely one of many instances of genocide rather than a unique event, and equate the suffering of Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip to that of Jews under the Nazis.

Delegates are also bracing for huge anti-Israel demonstrations from South Africa's large Arab and Muslim population.

Over a dozen negotiators, advisors, policy analysts and officials from several federal ministries are expected to attend, including from the departments of Canadian Heritage, foreign affairs, Indian and northern affairs, and justice, as well as the Canadian Human Rights Commission. Observers from three provinces and two cities will also attend, as will some 100 Canadians from various Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs).

Canada's delegation, while "mid-level," is a sign this country is taking the conference seriously, says Karen Mock, who will attend the meeting as national director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights and as chair of a special advisory group to Fry.

At one point, Canada did not rule out boycotting the conference if the anti-Zionist rhetoric was not softened or removed. But Canadian officials have said all along that attending would accomplish more than staying away.

Mock, like other delegates, believes that wrangling over anti-Israel and anti-Semitic language will continue "right down to the wire," and even after the conference begins.

But she's satisfied that the Canadian delegation is strong and could affect change.

Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy, who will also attend the meeting, said Canada "has been playing a very positive role, especially as it relates to the anti-Israel in tive." He noted that Rabbi Michael Melc Israel's deputy foreign minister, pra Canada's efforts at the conclusion of a re preparatory meeting in Geneva.

Landy said there are two main options to Canada if the conference's agenda proc along anti-Israel lines: to refuse to endo final resolution, or to walk out midway.

The latter, while rather un-Canadian, w send a strong message, Landy said.

Delegates will also be on the lookou cosmetic alterations to language. For exan at the last Geneva meeting, some Arab s reportedly agreed to substitute the term cupying power" for "Zionism," leaving Je delegates unimpressed.

Also late last week, the world was wa for a decision from the U.S. State Depart on whether Secretary of State Colin Po would attend the Durban conference whether a low-level American delega would be sent.

Palestinian leaders accuse U.S. of bias as Bush backs Israel

"If the Palestinians are interested in a dialogue," said Bush, "then I would strongly urge Mr. Arafat to put 100 percent effort into stopping the terrorist activity, and I believe he can do a better job of doing that."

Over the weekend, the Palestinians were also forced to withdraw a draft resolution at the UN that included a call for a "monitoring mechanism" in the West Bank and Gaza, after it became clear that the United States was ready to use its veto power in the Security Council to scupper the idea.

Palestinian spokesperson Hanan Ashrawi harshly criticized Bush's remarks. "We have now a full and absolute American bias. An American president," she said, "is parroting the Israeli point of view."

Ashrawi told the Associated Press that the Americans "are providing support to the point where they have become complicit to the crime."

PA minister Yasser Abed Rabbo also lashed out at the Americans on Sunday, telling Palestine Radio that Bush's adoption of Sharon's no-talks-under-fire policy was intended to block a possible meeting between Arafat and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

Abed Rabbo said the Americans have no interest in playing an active role in getting the two sides back to the negotiating table, and also do not want any other party filling this role. The U.S., he added, wants to maintain the present situation and is encouraging "Israeli terror" against the Palestinian people.

The Bush administration does not want to get involved in the conflict. Its major goal is regional stability, so as to ensure the price of oil is not affected, according to Ha'aretz diplomatic correspondent Aluf Benn.

While Sharon has twice visited Bush in the White House since taking office in March, Arafat has yet to receive an invitation. The White House has also consistently opposed sending observers to the region. The Bush administration's support for Israel, Benn said, has until now eroded Arafat's efforts to isolate Israel and precipitate international intervention in the conflict.

Benn added that at present there is "full understanding" between Bush and Sharon. "When he assumed office, Sharon decided that diplomatic co-ordination with Washington was his government's paramount interest," Benn wrote in Sunday's paper. "His anti-American positions of the past [only two years ago, as foreign minister in Benjamin Netanyahu's government, Sharon opposed the Kosovo operation] went into cold storage. The new Sharon is America's staunch ally in the Middle East, the keeper of regional stability.

"Bush accepts without reservation the principle established by Sharon that there can be no negotiations under fire, and he refuses to invite Arafat to Washington. In return, the president demands good behaviour from Israel and restraint in deploying force."

Syrian posting to UN Security Council opposed

Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy said he was astonished and dismayed that Canada would consider backing Syria's candidacy. In a letter to Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley, he argued, "Canada should not be a party to such a travesty."

Syria, he pointed out, has a terrible human rights record, is designated by the U.S. State Department as a country that supports international terrorism, and is run by a "ruthless dictator" (Bashir Assad) who "appears to be even more viscerally antisemitic and anti-Israel than his father, and that is no mean achievement." (During Pope John Paul II's visit to Syria in May , Assad claimed Jews betrayed and tortured Jesus and had committed treachery against the prophet Mohammed.)

Paul Michaels, a spokesman for the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's lobby group on Israel, said the election of Syria would "send the wrong message regarding the credibility of the [Security Council] and what it stands for."

He said Syria violates several UN resolutions and principles, including respect for international peace and human rights. It opposes the Oslo peace process, it supports radical Islamic terrorist organizations and it occupies Lebanon in violation of UN Security Resolution 245.

"Canada should take a moral stand and withhold its support. That would send a signal to the world that Syria does not have a role in the Security Council," Michaels said.

Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon said the best that can be expected in opposing Syria's nomination is for it to have to go to a second round of voting.

Israel is vigorously opposing Syria's candidacy and has asked is friends in North America and Europe not to back its Mideast neighbour.

"No one is willing so far to give us their position, because the decision will be made later on. Some of our best friends say it is better to engage Syria... We don't agree," Divon said.

"We feel very strongly about the negative role that Syria plays in every platform."

Divon suggests a Syrian role on the Security Council would allow it to take an active role in advancing anti-Israel resolutions and it would give the more radical Arab states a prominently-placed ally.

Divon placed the Syrian candidacy in a wider context, saying its nomination by the Arab bloc is part of a trend on the international diplomatic scene to isolate, marginalize and deligitimize Israel.

But by raising "serious question marks [about Syria's candidacy], people can see how ridiculous things are," Divon said.

Prevention, not revenge is the goal

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israel has many reasons to want to try to kill Mohammed Def, one of the heads of the military wing of Hamas, but he was not the target of last week's operation in Gaza.

Analysis

It is quite likely that Def did indeed happen into the area by chance, as Palestinian sources claim. Def, no doubt, feels very lucky to be alive.

For Israel, this is yet further proof that Def was freed from jail and that he is active in the war against Israel. The account with Def is a long and bloody one. He is responsible for a number of Palestinian suicide bombings.

Yet despite this bloody account, Israel's policy is not one of revenge. At this stage in the conflict, Israel's focus is on preventing future attacks, and this is the criteria for Israel's pinpoint assassinations, which are aimed at reducing terror attacks and weakening, both professionally and morally, those who wish to harm Israeli citizens.

In any event, even if the IDF did not manage to strike its chosen target last week, the Palestinians can safely assume that Israeli intelligence services have reliable information about the movements of Palestinian activists.

Last week was a bad week for Palestinian military activists on the West Bank as well. Two Fatah cells that, for some time, have been engaged in laying roadside bombs on the road leading up to Mount Eibal were hit hard by an elite IDF unit.

In the first incident, a group of Palestinians was spotted planting a bomb at the side of the road. Two of its men were killed in the ensuing gun battle.

A message was sent to the Palestinian representative of the district security co-ordination committee that Israel would hand over the bodies after it had finished dismantling the bomb. Normally, representatives of the Red Crescent are sent to pick up bodies, but because of the bombs, they were told not to do so this time.

Less than an hour later, another group of Palestinians was spotted approaching the area. The lookout saw that they were armed, and Israeli troops opened fire. Two more Palestinians were killed. The Palestinians claim that the men had come to remove the bodies of those killed earlier, but they were also found to be carrying explosives.

Spielberg foundation shifts to education

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — After videotaping the testimony of more than 50,000 Holocaust survivors, filmmaker Steven Spielberg's foundation is shifting to an even more daunting task – a worldwide educational campaign against bigotry and intolerance.

Spielberg launched the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation in 1994 after filming Schindler's List. Completing an archive containing testimony from 51,661 eyewitnesses was "a dream that became a remarkable reality," he said.

Each of the survivors interviewed has become "a teacher, putting a real face, a real voice, a real experience in front of this and future generations," Spielberg said.

"The archive is their perpetual link to our expanded long-range objectives of remembrance and education."

Using state-of-the-art media technology, the educational effort will be aimed particularly at a new generation of students, said Douglas Greenberg, president and CEO of the Shoah Foundation.

"We will pursue this effort with the same urgency as our original mission of interviewing aging survivors," Greenberg said in a phone interview.

To oversee the outreach program, the Shoah Foundation is establishing an education department with an annual budget of $2 million. An international search for a director to head the department is now under way.

Parallel to the new program, a staff of 69 researchers is tackling the task of reviewing and indexing the 117,000 hours of testimony by men and women – from 57 countries in 32 languages – who survived concentration camps, were in hiding during the Holocaust, lived under Nazi rule or rescued Jews.

It would take a single person scanning the videos 24 hours a day, more than 13 years to finish the job.

As it is, it will take the staff four more years to link the archived material through 25,000 keywords. It would have taken much longer but for an innovative technology developed in-house, which allows one person to catalog a single testimony – usually two hours long, but sometimes running up to five hours – in half a day instead of one week.

The final result, Greenberg believes, will be the largest available video database in the world, usable by scholars, teachers, students and, eventually, the general public.

Some of the testimony is already viewable at the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles. Other repositories will be the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, the Museum of Jewish Heritage – A Living Memorial to the Holocaust in New York, the Fortunoff Video Archive at Yale University and the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem.

The Shoah Foundation also has reversed its previous ban on making the testimony available on the Internet, which was intended to avoid misuse by hate groups and others.

Now, Greenberg said, "we won't put the entire archive on the Internet, but we'll have some significant chunks of it. We'll find a sensible and secure way to do this."

Some testimony can be viewed on the Shoah foundation's Web site at www.vhf.org.

The foundation already has a head start in its educational outreach, mainly through CD-ROMs and film documentaries.

One CD-ROM is being used in American and German schools. Prize-winning documentaries that have used material include 1998 Oscar recipient The Last Days, as well as Survivors of the Holocaust and The Lost Children of Berlin.

Completed or in the works are documentaries by five international directors, drawing on survivor testimony in their own languages. Some Who Lived (Argentina), Eyes of the Holocaust (Hungary) and I Remember (Poland) already have debuted in their respective countries.

To be shown later this year are Hell on Earth (Czech Republic) and Children of the Abyss (Russia).

Asked whether the Shoah foundation would ever complete its mission and close up shop, Greenberg said, "When we first started in 1994, we thought that after collecting 50,000 survivor testimonies, our mission would be completed."

But with the prevalence of bigotry and the planned educational campaign against it, he said, there is no end in sight for the foundation.

"We started as a project," Greenberg said, "and are now on our way to becoming an institution."

One man's new attitude toward Israel

Joschka Fischer is a name that's been in the news a lot these days. Fischer is the German foreign minister and vice chancellor who is trying, with U.S. approval, to arrange a ceasefire between Israel and the Palestinians. He stands firmly behind the Mitchell plan as "the only game in town." That plan calls for an immediate halt to the violence as an unconditional first step to further talks.

Fischer gained media prominence two months ago when he happened to be in Israel during the horrific suicide bombing of the Tel Aviv disco that left twenty-one teenagers dead and over a hundred wounded. His outraged reaction led to his virtually dictating Arafat's plea for a ceasefire – something Arafat failed to adhere to before, or since.

Just who is Fischer that he should be playing such an increasingly prominent role in Israel-Palestinian affairs? Political and cultural critic Paul Berman has just written a lengthy and fascinating profile of him ("The Passion of Joschka Fischer," New Republic, Aug. 27/Sept. 3, 2001).

The story of Fischer's '60s and '70s left-wing radicalism – including his attack, as the leader of the Revolutionary Struggle's militant activities, on a policeman in Frankfurt in April 1973, has been reported before, especially in the European media. The value, however, of Berman's profile lies in the detailed picture he draws of Fischer's evolution from the new left extremism to liberalism – a shift exhibited also by significant elements of the radical movement as a whole. (The remaining radical leftists, along with radical rightists, stand united in their anti-Israel activism and account for much European anti-Israel – and, Berman argues, anti-Jewish – sentiment.) More than anything, Berman paints a detailed portrait of the shifting intellectual climate of the European left today.

In his radical phase, Fischer attended a meeting of the PLO in Algiers in 1969, where the PLO issued a resolution calling, in effect, for Israel's destruction. Thirty years later, with his radical leftism behind him, Fischer allied with the Green party, joined the German government, became foreign minister, and to the dismay of many of his colleagues on the left, supported NATO's bombing of Serbia as a justified defence of the Kosovars.

But what reshaped Fischer's attitude toward Israel? According to Berman, it was Fischer's shocked awakening in the mid-70's to the barbarities of anti-Israel terrorism, including German participation in the Entebbe affair (by people he knew) in which Jews were singled out from among the hijacked Air France plane to be murdered, that permanently changed him.

"Fischer seems never to have gotten over the shock of Entebbe," Berman writes.

So when Fischer heard the blast at the Tel Aviv disco – he was apparently just that close – he was moved to act. "It was Fischer, more than any foreign minister or religious leader or world leader of any sort, who took it upon himself to confront Arafat in person, who [so it has been reported] berated Arafat ferociously and even forced him into declaring some sort of ceasefire. The erstwhile militant for the PLO, now militant against Palestinian terror."

New Jacobovici documentary premieres at Film Fest

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto director Simcha Jacobovici's latest documentary, The Struma, will premiere at the Toronto International Film Festival, which runs from Sept. 6-15.

The 92-minute movie, one of several films of particular Jewish interest at this year's festival, turns on a refugee ship which met with tragedy during the Holocaust.

The vessel, the Struma, set sail from Constanta, Romania, in 1941, bound for Palestine. Engine failure forced it pull into Istanbul. Under British pressure, Turkey refused to admit the 800 Romanian Jewish passengers.

The disabled ship was towed into the Black Sea, where it was sunk by a Soviet submarine under mysterious circumstances.

Combining rare historical footage and interviews with the grandson of two of its doomed passengers, The Struma zeroes in on a recent effort by an international expedition to find the watery grave of the ill-fated ship.

Jacobovici's previous films include Quest for the Lost Tribes and Hollywoodism: Jews, Movies & The American Dream.

Tim Blake Nelson's The Grey Zone, starring Harvey Keitel and Mira Sorvino, is set in the Auschwitz concentration camp in Poland.

It tells the harrowing story of a squad of Jewish prisoners in a special unit forced to work against their fellow Jews.

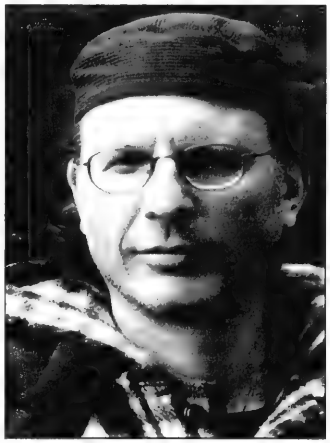
The Believer, directed by Henry Bean, is based on a real-life event. It's about a young, self-hating American Jew who joins a neo-Nazi movement and, in vain, attempts to suppress his true identity.

Istvan Szabo's Taking Sides, with Harvey Keitel and Stellan Skarsgard, is a drama set in U.S.-occupied Berlin at the end of World War II.

Keitel plays an army officer sent to Germany to interrogate a famous symphony conductor who supported the Nazi regime.

His grueling cross-examination makes him wonder what he would have done had he been in the conductor's shoes.

Enigma, adapted by Tom Stoppard from a best-selling Robert Harris novel, is a romantic thriller about British code-breakers pitted against Nazi U-boats in 1943.



Simcha Jacobovici

Directed by Michael Apted, the film stars Dougray Scott, Kate Winslet and Jeremy Northam.

Late Marriage, from Israeli director Dover Kosashvili, revolves around a thirtysomething man from a conservative family who wants to see him married according to Jewish tradition.

Afghanistan's repressive Islamic fundamentalist regime is the topic of The Sun Behind the Moon by Iranian filmmaker Mohsen Makhmalbaf.

It follows an Afghani journalist in exile who, after receiving a desperate letter from his sister in Afghanistan, tries to spirit her out of the country.

This year's festival, the 26th, will screen 326 films from 54 countries, said Piers Handling, the festival's director, at a press conference last week.

Sixty percent of the features are in languages other than English.

Publisher says Canadian book market is too unstable

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Citing an unstable book market, the publisher of books by Morley Torgov, the late Al Waxman and others, has temporarily ceased publishing and intends to work as a literary consultant and agent for at least a year.

"I'm taking a hiatus from publishing," Malcolm Lester says. "I hope to be back within the next year to 18 months."

Over the last decade, Malcolm Lester Books has produced many noteworthy titles of general as well as Jewish interest, including, That's What I Am, Waxman's autobiography; The Ransom of God, by Hesh Troper; The War to End All Wars, by Torgov; 100 Cigarettes and a Bottle of Vodka, by Arthur Schaller; The Spirit of Canada, by Barbara Hehner; and The Art of Glenn Gould, edited by John Roberts.

"The market is very uncertain and I wanted, at this stage in my life, to minimize the financial risk," he says. "It's very difficult to be an entrepreneurial publisher this year. We don't have large pools of capital like the large multinationals, and I felt it was prudent to use my skills in the industry on a consulting basis rather than an entrepreneurial basis."

Malcolm Lester Books continues to exist but will remain inactive for at least 12 months, says Lester, whose work as a consultant keeps him busy. He recently attended a book fair in Chicago, where he promoted a popular series of children's books.

Lester, who represents the estate of the late Glenn Gould, recently sold world rights to Doubleday Canada for a proposed book, Glenn Gould: A Life in Pictures, which the company intends to publish in the fall of 2002 to mark the 70th anniversary of Gould's birth and the 20th anniversary of his death. Lester also represents a biography of Gould by Otto Friedrich that has already been widely translated.

"Right now I'm negotiating Chinese rights for the book," he says.

As a consultant, Lester assisted in the recent publication of The Very Narrow Bridge, by Toronto Rabbi Erwin Schild, and From Immigration to Integration: The Jewish Experience in Canada, an anthology of 16 academic essays published by B'nai Brith Canada. He's also produced a series of guides on different surgical procedures, the first title of which is So You're having Angioplasty – What Happens Next?

"I organize the whole publishing process, everything from editing to design, and co-ordinating printing and binding," he says.

His clients, he adds, generally take care of product distribution.

Many of the difficulties currently besetting the book industry have occurred because of the rise and subsequent partial collapse of "mega" bookstore chains like Chapters and Indigo, which have now merged, Lester says.

"The problem is that Chapters expanded too fast, and it seemed to me like a giant pyramid scheme. They ended up cannibalizing business from their own stores. They didn't create business for their stores, they took business away from their own stores."

Lester began publishing after several years of rabbinical study at Hebrew Union College in the '60s.

"I thought [it] would be a business I would enjoy because it combined business with intellectual pursuits," he says.

Along with the industry, Lester has had his ups and downs as a publisher. Yet he has a solid reputation, and despite the current uncertain market, he says there's plenty of reason for optimism because Canadian books are widely accepted now, both domestically and abroad.

"When I first started publishing in the early 1970s, Canadian authors were being ghettoized in the Canadiana section of the bookstore," he recalls. "That was 25 or 30 years ago. Now they're displayed quite permanently up front, with the best books. And the Canadian public, if they're buying gifts, will often buy a Canadian book as a present."

Musician provides unique sound for 'rhythmic' play

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Perhaps because he is a musician, Ben Grossman describes the text of The Chairs by Eugene Ionescu as "quite rhythmic."

Grossman, who will be mixing sound cues for Artword Theatre's production of The Chairs from Sept. 25 to Oct. 14, says, "There is a rhythm to the text... there is a sort of inevitability to it, like the score of a symphony."

The oft-overlooked absurdist classic is about a lighthouse keeper and his wife who invite a large crowd to hear how they sum up their lives. But even though there are plenty of chairs, the visitors are invisible.

"The playwright described it as a tragic farce," says Grossman, who is teaming up with director Soheil Parsa and set designer Jan Komarek for this production. Parsa and Komarek brought Grossman to The Chairs when they heard his sound work for Dr. Faustas Lights the Lights, by Gertrude Stein. Grossman also credits Michelle Polak – who, along with Peter Fairbridge, is co-starring in the play – for bringing him to their attention.

In addition to The Chairs, Grossman is also preparing for the Soulpepper productions of Ionescu's one-act plays, The Lesson, directed by Chris Abraham, and Bald Soprano, directed by Jim Warren, and running from Sept. 6 to 22.

For Grossman, sound is a performer in the play. He mixes voices of characters with sounds of nature ("as if you were walking through the woods") and a host of other sounds into the dialogue.

"I try not to draw much of a line between sound effects, actors' voices, sounds in the room. I try to incorporate them all," he says.

Born in Maine, Grossman spent his early years in Montreal and has lived in Toronto since 1978. He attended alternative high schools, or as he put it, "schools for delinquent artists." Though without formal education in music or theatre, he spent three months in Istanbul studying Turkish classical music. Today he makes his living as a freelance musician, playing percussion and string instruments, and lately, a hurdy gurdy. He was bitten by the theatre bug a long time ago and wants his sound to reflect whatever play he is working on.

He is doing the sound for The Chairs because, he says, "I've always wanted to do it."

Though he and Komarek will not be seen by the audience, he will be in his sound booth, sweating it out "live" along with the actors. A grid of tiny speakers over the audience will convey his sounds throughout the theatre.

"[The Chairs] was quite radical when it was first produced in the '50s, but it is not a shocker today," he says.

Nevertheless, he says, "We've taken certain liberties with [it], not always following stage directions... we think the end result will give the audience a new conception."

NEW YORK PARLEY ON JEWISH STUDIES IS OPEN TO PUBLIC

One year after its opening, the Manhattan-based Center for Jewish History is planning an international conference featuring a roster of leading scholars in Jewish studies. Although some events are by invitation only, some general sessions are open to the public, free of charge.

The two-day congress runs Sunday, Oct. 28, and Monday, Oct. 29. To give a sense of the range of participants, here's a list of academics scheduled to participate in a public session on Creating Modern Jewish Studies: Dr. Robert Chazan, New York University; Dr. Jane Gerber, Columbia University; Dr. Michael Brenner, University of Munich; Dr. Jonathan Frankel, Hebrew University, Israel; Dr. Jeffrey S. Gurock, Yeshiva University; and Dr. Stephen J. Zipperstein, Stanford University.

Other academics are coming from Vassar, Yale, and universities across the United States, London, Paris, Berlin and Madrid.

The Center for Jewish History embodies a partnership of five major institutions of Jewish scholarship, history and art: the American Jewish Historical Society, the American Sephardi Federation, the Leo Baeck Institute, Yeshiva University Museum and the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research. 15 West 16th St., New York. 212-294-8301.

The short film uses a flashback technique to explore the angst and identity questions faced by a young man as he embarks on his first job interview. A recent honours graduate from Temple University, Semanoff has already had a distribution offer for the film, which has been praised for the positive way it deals with questions of Jewish identity.

"The film has only a small niche market, relatively speaking," he says. "I was offered a distribution deal by the largest company serving that niche. The deal would make the film widely available to Jewish youth groups, synagogues and the general Jewish audience."

Trouble is, Semanoff risks legal action from the Screen Actors Guild if the film goes into distribution because two of its actors, who are members of the union, worked for free. Semanoff says he "had a vague understanding" that he would have to pay union scale to them if distribution ever occurred.

The frustrated filmmaker estimates it would cost him $4,000 on top of the film's indebtedness to release On Common Ground commercially.

"It would be crazy for me to bite off another $4,000 to put the film into distribution," he says, adding that it's unlikely the film could earn that amount in rentals.

Citing its potential use as a tool in fostering tolerance and Jewish identity among the young, Semanoff has put out an appeal for "angels" to help make it possible to distribute the award-winning short.

"I'd like to be able to add the names of a couple of angels to the film's credits in return for making it possible to place the film into distribution," he says.

TORONTO — Niki Lederer's love of dogs landed her a solo exhibition at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

"It is a big break for an emerging artist like myself," she said of her exhibit, titled Dog Show, her first at the AGO, which runs until Oct. 14.

Through the medium of pet cemetery gravestone rubbings, sand-cast glass reliefs and acrylic paintings, the New York City-based artist explores the incredibly strong bond between humans and dogs.

"Dog Show," she said, "was inspired by the obsession I've had with dogs since I was a young girl."

Lederer, a Canadian born in London, Ont., in 1971, added, "I never had a dog as a child and always wanted one. Once the work for the exhibition was completed, I adopted my dog Poncho, a Chihuahua mixed breed, from a local pet shelter in Brooklyn."

For a rewarding travel experience, pay a visit to the Turkish third of Cyprus

By HENRY SREBRNIK
Special to The CJN

NICOSIA — The Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC) is full of wonderful Mediterranean beaches, historical ruins dating as far back as Neolithic age, impressive medieval palaces and rugged mountains.

Yet few tourists ever visit these sites, since this little country of under 200,000 people has been denied diplomatic recognition by every state other than Turkey.

The country proclaimed its independence in 1983, nine years after the Turkish army invaded the island of Cyprus, which was then governed by its Greek Cypriot majority, and took control of 37 percent of its territory.

But the TRNC remains a de facto state, without international standing, diplomatic relations, or a UN seat. As a result, no cruise ships come here, nor does the TRNC have direct airplane connections with any country other than Turkey. Tourists must first touch down in Turkey before landing at Ercan International Airport near the Turkish sector of Nicosia.

This has been a major impediment to the development of the tourist industry. The Greek south attracts some 2.5 million visitors a year, but the north is visited by fewer than 400,000, all but 70,000 of them mainland Turks.

Magnificent archeological sites, such as those at Roman-era Salamis and Soli, both of which had large Jewish populations, imposing Byzantine-era mountaintop castles, like the ones at Buffavento, Kantara and St. Hilarion, and superb seaside resorts, such as picturesque Kyrenia (Girne), with its Byzantine-built castle and Venetian harbour are almost devoid of visitors.

The 80-kilometre-long Karpas Peninsula that juts into the sea in the northeast remains wild and almost untouched by development, an eco-traveller's paradise. It is a vast nature reserve where hikers can trek for miles without meeting another person. Colonies of wild turtles nest on its southern beaches.

My wife and I, along with a guide, drove along a winding little road, hardly more than a trail in places, into the Besparmak, or "Five Fingers," mountains of the Kyrenia range, to see the remains of Kantara Castle. When we reached the top, some 600 metres above sea level, and marvelled at the spectacular views of the island in all directions, we were the only ones there.

The TRNC is rich in archeological sites, in particular those from the Hellenistic and Roman periods, but many of the ruins are rapidly deteriorating, since UNESCO looks with disfavour upon any archeologiscal preservation.

Soli is one of the 10 ancient city kingdoms of Cyprus and dates back to at least 700 BCE. It flourished in the Roman period due to its rich copper mines – the word Cyprus itself is derived from the Latin word cuprium. The site includes the remains of an acropolis, a royal palace, a Roman theatre and a basilica built in the early Christian era.

Yet due to lack of money, excavations have come to a halt. Tiles and artifacts have been haphazardly thrown together into piles, and many of the beautiful mosaic tiles have been broken, and shards of pottery destroyed.

The ruins at Salamis which once had a large Jewish population.

Though the Turkish north is now almost entirely Muslim and possesses many beautiful mosques, it remains home to splendid churches and monasteries, such as St. Barnabas, near Salamis, where Barnabas, a Cypriot Jew who became one of the apostles of Jesus, is buried. The monastery is now an archeological museum featuring an amazing collection of Greek Orthodox icons, yet visited by no more than a handful of tourists.

Equally neglected are the enchanting Abbey of Bellapais, founded by Augustine monks in 1205, in the tranquil hills above Kyrenia (Girne), and the Crusader-era twin churches of the famed Templar and Hospital orders of knights, now being restored, in Famagusta (Gazimagusa).

The old walled city of Famagusta, where time seems to have stood still, has a wonderful 12th-century palace. The city's fortifications, reinforced by the Venetians who ruled here from 1489 until they were defeated by the Ottomans in 1571, incorporate a citadel known as Othello's Tower – for this is the setting of Shakespeare's play, The Tragedy of Othello, the Moor of Venice.

nnovative Weizmann approach limits paralysis

/ YORK — Weizmann Institute scientists have proposed novative approach for preventing complete paralysis partial spinal cord injury.

ie approach consists of boosting the body's natural ine mechanisms to improve the outcome of trauma.

ie team of Prof. Michal Schwartz of the Weizmann ite's neurobiology department has already developed nmune-based therapy for the spinal cord. It is currently tested in humans by Proneuron Biotechnologies Ltd.

iat therapy is aimed at repairing the spinal cord after a lete injury. The new approach pursues a related but dif- therapeutic target: to limit degeneration after a partial l cord injury. The scientists report their latest results in ug. 15 issue of the Journal of Clinical Investigation.

llowing injury to the central nervous system – brain or l cord – a wave of damage spreads from the injury site several days or weeks, killing nerve cells and fibres that ved the initial trauma.

iis secondary degeneration can be even more destructive the initial damage. As a result, an injury that initially ted only partial damage on the nerve tissue in the spinal nay eventually result in total paralysis.

the United States alone, approximately 10,000 people n a spinal cord injury each year. More than half of these es are classified as incomplete, or partial, meaning that nerve fibres survived the initial trauma. If the surviving tissue could be protected against secondary degeneration, this would significantly improve the final outcome.

In the past, Schwartz and colleagues showed that autoimmune T cells – the white blood cells of the immune system that interact with the body's own tissues – have a protective effect on damaged tissue in the spinal cord, reducing secondary degeneration.

This protective response is the body's own way of minimizing the consequences of trauma. However, the naturally occurring T-cell response is restricted in its effectiveness.

In the new study, rats were vaccinated with peptides or protein fragments derived from the central nervous system soon after severe partial injury to the spinal cord.

The peptides were selected so that they would boost the natural protective mechanisms of the immune system without triggering an autoimmune disease. Rats vaccinated with the peptides showed significant recovery of movement.

Tissue analysis revealed that the treated animals had substantially more healthy nerve fibres in the spinal cord than the untreated rats, suggesting that the treatment protected the animals from secondary degeneration.

Results indicate that the therapeutic window for T-cell-based treatment is at least one week after injury. This approach may also prove effective in other disorders of the central nervous system, such as stroke or traumatic brain injury.

Montrealer goes to Israel for experimental cancer treatment

MONTREAL – The Israeli doctor who has agreed to perform experimental bone-marrow transplant surgery on a Montreal man critically ill with Hodgkin's lymphoma is internationally acclaimed for pioneering this potentially lifesaving technique.

Dr. Shimon Slavin, an immunologist, heads the bone marrow transplantation department at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem and its affiliated research centre, where 27-year-old Vlasi Carassavas has gone for treatment.

Marion Mayman, national president of the Hadassah-WIZO Organization of Canada, said Slavin and his Hadassah colleagues have developed a technique that avoids high doses of chemotherapy used in standard stem-cell transplant procedures. The technique transplants stem cells from a donor, which then carry on "biological warfare" with the recipient's malignant cells. In the process, the patient's immunological response is often boosted with successful results.

In January 1999, Slavin was summoned to the Royal Palace in Amman, Jordan to give advice on the treatment of King Hussein. He was part of the team that flew with the ailing monarch to the Mayo Clinic in the United States.

The Carassavas family turned to Slavin after finding out he has pioneered a method of using the bone marrow stem cells of mismatched family members or even unrelated persons, or alternative sources such as blood cells, in transplants.

Two drives in the Greek community, which attracted 700 people, and a search by Quebec's blood agency, Héma-Québec, of registries worldwide failed to find a compatible donor for Carassavas, who was diagnosed with Hodgkin's lymphoma three years ago.

Conventional therapy in Montreal, as well as experimental treatment in Houston, Tex., did not halt the cancer's progress. While in Texas, the family heard about Slavin's success in treating lymphoma patients who cannot find a perfectly matched donor, said Vlasi's older brother Jimmy.

Carassavas's father is the closest match available and he will be the donor for the transplant at Hadassah Hospital. His blood matches on only four of six of the measures of profile. The Régie de l'Assurance Maladie du Québec considers Slavin's procedure experimental and will not pay the $230,000 medical bill.

Carassavas and his parents expect to stay in Jerusalem for up to a year so that he will be close to Hadassah Hospital for check-ups. Canadian Hadassah-WIZO is following Carassavas' difficult journey closely and is offering moral support.

For a rewarding travel experience, pay a visit to the Turkish third of Cyprus

During Roman times, Cyprus' Jewish community flourished. Jews were particularly active in the mining and export of copper. Both Barnabas and Paul tried to spread the Christian faith in Salamis and Soli, and in the 2nd century CE, a revolt broke out among the Jewish population. They apparently killed almost the entire non-Jewish population of Salamis, resulting in their expulsion from the island.

Jews returned in medieval times; during the 16th century, some 2,000 lived in Famagusta. Their numbers dwindled during the period of Ottoman Turkish rule.

For those trying to avoid the crowds, the TRNC is the place to go. There are no hard sells or hucksters, nor have historical sites been "Disneyfied" and turned into theme parks.

There are disadvantages, of course: most stores won't take credit cards, and bank machines are few and far between, so visitors end up carrying wads of Turkish lira (the official currency) in their pockets. Still, this is the way travel used to be, and getting here is well worth the extra effort it takes.

So, the next time a Mediterranean vacation strikes your fancy, visit a world where Gothic churches rub shoulders with crusader castles and Turkish mosques, and Roman ruins with 19th-century British colonial architecture. Take advantage of its scenic and cultural wonders, its charming towns and cities and its miles and miles of sandy beaches.

The sense of the past continues to pervade the present in Turkish Cyprus and makes for a truly unforgettable holiday.

A cautionary note: if you visit the north, you will not, under any circumstances, be allowed into the Greek-governed Republic of Cyprus, and should you allow TRNC customs officials to stamp your passport, you might have difficulty entering Greece itself. If you go to the south first, day passes to the TRNC can be obtained at the Ledra Palace Hotel on the "Green Line" in Nicosia. You can only cross into the north on foot and you may not stay there overnight.

Part of the AGO's Present Tense series, Dog Show underscores our affinity and affection for dogs.

In Dog Map, Lederer interprets the world of dog breeding through canine glass castings.

"I'm interested in the idea of lineage and pedigree," she explained. "I focused on the geneology of dogs because they are such a huge species with so many variations within them. Like people, they are often unfairly stereotyped by their outward appearance."

In Series 6 Camouflaged, paintings in acrylic on canvas, she dwells on the silhouettes of different breeds.

"They initially appear to be paintings of military camouflage patterns. On closer inspection, they reveal dog breed silhouettes painted in olive, ochre, brown and black."

Lederer's cemetery rubbings, which explore the relationship between humans and dogs, pay homage to deceased and beloved pets.

"Dog Show began with rubbings I made in pet cemeteries in Paris and New York. I was interested in how people's emotions were so unselfconsciously expressed in these public venues.

"The pet tombstones make tangible the intangible experience of unconditional love that dogs can give."

Lederer's parents Eva and Frid immigrated to Canada from Bratislava, Slovakia in 1968. Lederer was raised in Vancouver.

"As a first-generation Canadian, I'm grateful that my parents came to Canada when they did, and provided me with the opportunity to make my way in the world as an artist."

Lederer, who has worked as a curatorial co-ordinator and art gallery assistant, studied art, photography and sculpture at the University of Victoria and Hunter College in New York City.

"I remained in New York to pursue my artistic career. At this point, it is difficult to know if I'm in New York to stay, but I'm making the most of it."

Lederer, having exhibited at group shows in Canada and the United States, generally works with materials she can manipulate without the aid of an assistant or heavy machinery.

She works as a graphic designer by day to support her art practice.

"Eventually, I want to concentrate all my time on my studio, but for now, I need to support myself with graphic design work."

When Dog Show ends in October, Lederer hopes it can be exhibited in New York City.

Solomon's wisdom helps Capriati return to top form

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Thousands of years ago in ancient Israel, King Solomon was considered the wisest man in the land, able to solve countless problems. Three years ago, American tennis star Jennifer Capriati was seeking a wise man's counsel to help her reconstruct her game.

Harold Solomon

She found her King Solomon in American tennis great Harold Solomon, who won 22 tournaments from 1971-84 and also had an outstanding reputation as a coach, guiding Mary Joe Fernandez to top-10 rankings from 1994-98.

From 1990-94, it did not appear that Capriati needed a coach at all. Her father Stefano was her guiding light, and Jennifer was the darling of tennis fans worldwide, winning on a regular basis since turning pro at age 14. In 1991 at age 15, she became the youngest player in history to win the Canadian Open, a victory that helped vault her to a sixth-place ranking in the world that year. She also won the gold medal in tennis at the Olympics in 1992, and millions of dollars in prize money and endorsements followed.

In the mid-'90s, Capriati's tennis career appeared to be coming to an end following arrests for smoking marijuana and shoplifting. Rebelling against the pressure of winning, Capriati quit tennis in 1994 and 1995 as she tried to become her own person.

"To put in bluntly, I had a lot of growing up to do when I decided to quit tennis [at age] 18," said Capriati, who competed recently at the $1.2-million Rogers AT&T Cup women's tennis championships, held at the National Tennis Centre at York University.

Capriati returned to competitive tennis in 1996 without a coach, but with plenty of desire to compete again.

Desire was not enough for her to compete well. Capriati spent the next few years losing regularly. By the end of 1998, her ranking fell as low as 101st. She met with her father, and they agreed Solomon might provide some of the answers to her problems.

"When I got the call from Stefano Capriati in 1999 to coach Jennifer, I was reluctant at first," recalled Solomon. "I told him 'I need to speak with Jennifer.' I had to be convinced that she wanted to dedicate herself to winning in tennis again.

"I spoke with her on the phone for two hours and was absolutely convinced that this young woman put her problems behind her. She was hungry; she was determined to do all she could to win, and I knew then and there she would return to her old form again."

Solomon took the pressure off Capriati by reminding her of the fun and joy of playing tennis, by showing patience with her errors and by keeping her fit.

The combination paid off. In 1999, Capriati won three tournaments, and her ranking shot up to 23rd. By the following year, her improved play saw her ranking rise to 14th.

Nevertheless, Capriati and Solomon parted ways in November 2000. "Jennifer and I left good friends. She wanted to have a coach with her full time. That could not be me. I missed my wife Jan and our two children [a daughter, Rachel, and a son, Jesse] back in Florida, and I did not want the rigours of daily travel on the tour. I wished her well and told her that her best years lay ahead," said Solomon.

His words were prophetic. Over the past year, Capriati's comeback made worldwide headlines. She won the recent Australian and French opens and finished as a semi-finalist at Wimbledon. Those impressive titles combined with her finishing as a finalist at the Rogers AT&T Cup lifted her ranking to third in the world, with a realistic shot at the no. 1 ranking if she wins the U.S. Open in September.

"Harold did everything a coach could do to make things easy for me. I am grateful to him, but at the same time, I knew I had it inside myself to win, to do as well as I could," said Capriati.

The wise coach has not been idle over the past year. At the Australian Open, Solomon helped Monica Seles focus on her tennis, and she responded with impressive wins in July over Capriati, Martina Hingis and Lindsay Davenport, while finishing as a semi-finalist at the Rogers AT&T Cup.

Solomon now serves as counsel to all the players on the women's tennis tour, finding agreeable ground between players with diverse interests, such as Venus Williams, Anna Kournikova, Seles and Capriati.

That's a problem that would tax even King Solomon.

Tennis Lines: 1965 Canadian Open champion Julie Heldman became the first female tennis player to be inducted into the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame on July 15 in Netanya, Israel. Heldman was ranked as high as fifth in the world in 1969, and was in the top 10 in 1969-70 and from '73-'74. She won the Federation Cup for the United States in 1966, '69 and '74 and won gold at the Maccabiah Games for singles, doubles and mixed doubles in 1969.

"It is a wonderful honour to be remembered for my days in tennis," said 55-year-old Heldman from her residence in Santa Monica, Calif. Heldman's most memorable match came in the 1973 U.S. Open when she upset top seed Billie Jean King en route to her semi-final finish.

"We used to call her Junkball Julie because she was a nasty player. She was just like a club player that sort of slices and dices and drives you crazy. If you didn't play well, she would drive you nuts. She was very smart and she used all her capability on the court. It was fun to watch. My first tournament I ever won was over her in 1974. It was a great moment for me," said tennis legend Martina Navratilova, who was a doubles semi-finalist with Aranxta Sanchez-Vicaro at the Rogers AT&T Cup.

Heldman used her smarts to become a tennis commentator, a lawyer, a judge and a business partner – in that order – over the years. She still holds the distinction of being the last Jewish winner of the Canadian Open women's tennis championships (Heldman also performed well at the Canadian Open in 1974, finishing as a finalist to Chris Evert and winning the doubles title that year with Gail Chanfreau), and is considered the best Jewish woman tennis player of all time.

Julie Heldman

Heldman joins her mother Gladys as the first mother-daughter combination in the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame. Gladys Heldman was inducted into the hall in 1985 as the founder of the original women's tennis tour in 1971, called the Virginia Slims Circuit, predating the multi-million- dollar women's tennis circuit of today.

Anna Smashnova of Israel, the top ranked Jewish tennis player on the women's circuit at no. 99, bypassed the Rogers AT&T Cup because her ranking was too low to enter the main draw.

Harel Levy of Israel continues his success on the men's tennis circuit in teaming with countryman Noam Okun for Israel's 3-2 victory over South Africa in Davis Cup action before his home country fans in Ramat Hasharon on July 22. Levy's victories over Marcos Ondruska (6-2, 6-2, 6-0) and Neville Godwin (3-6, 7-5, retired) combined with Okun's thrilling five set victory over Ondruska (6-2, 6-4, 6-7(1), 3-6, 7-5) advanced Israel to the next round of Davis Cup in the Group Two Euro/African Zone.

The bronze-winning men's doubles team in tennis at the Maccabiah Games – Jordan Bohnen of Toronto and Oren Befilli of Thornhill, along with coach Robert Bregman of Toronto – were guests of Tennis Canada at the Rogers AT&T Cup.

Recommended Reading

Fiction

• The Last Kabbalist of Lisbon, by Richard Zimler, The Overlook Press, $20.99, SC.

This suspenseful crime novel, an award-winning, international bestseller, takes the reader to the world of Jewish mysticism and Jewish life in Portugal in the early 16th century.

• The First Day and Other Stories, by Dvora Baron, University of California Press, $28.95, SC.

Wonderful stories by the first female, modern-Hebrew writer, translated by Naomi Seidman with Chana Kronfeld.

Non-Fiction

• The Seven Lights, by Adin Steinsaltz and Joey Eisenberg, Jason Aronson Inc., $59.99, HC.

A very interesting and enlightening, book-length dialogue on the major Jewish festivals between renowned Rabbis Adin Steinsaltz and Joey Eisenberg. A major influence is the teachings of scholar and kabbalist Rabbi Schneur Zalman of Lyady, founder of the Chabad movement. (Wonderful insights for the upcoming High Holy Days.)

• Legacy of Rage: Jewish Masculinity, Violence and Culture, by Warren Rosenberg, University of Massachusetts Press, $59.95, HC.

A brilliant, scholarly analysis of violence versus non-violence and the ideal masculine role model in Jewish history and the Jewish psyche. The work of thinkers Cynthia Ozick, Norman Mailer, Saul Bellow, Mark Helprin, Tony Kushner and others is examined.

• The Letters of Jonathan Netanyahu, with an introduction by Herman Wouk, Gefen Publishing House, $36.95, HC.

A series of letters written by the heroic commander of the Entebbe rescue force, from the age of 17 until just days before the raid. His strong intellect, sensitivity, bravery and love for his country, family and friends radiate throughout.

• Generation Exodus: The Fate of Young Jewish Refugees from Nazi Germany, by Walter Laqueur, Brandeis University Press, $48.95, HC.

The focus of this study is German Jewish youth of various religious and economic backgrounds who fled their country of birth during the Nazi period, adapted to their new homes and, as a whole, led remarkably successful lives. The author, a distinguished historian, is among that group. (Others include Henry Kissinger, Ruth Westheimer, and Shlomo Lahat, a mayor of Tel Aviv).

• Gray Matter: Discourses in Contemporary Halachah, by Rabbi Chaim Jachter, with Ezra Frazer, Rabbi Howard Jachter, $37.95, HC.

A student of Rabbis Yosef Dov Soloveitchik, Hershel Schachter and other internationally respected Torah luminaries, Rabbi Jachter discusses and analyzes diverse issues in Halachah (Jewish law), and includes various opinions. Topics include economic competition, permission for yeshiva students to serve in the army, the authentic Jewishness of the Falashas, and the problem of agunot (women whose husbands refuse to grant them a divorce).

Youth

• Forging Freedom, by Hudson Talbott, G.P. Putnam's Sons, $22.99, HC.

The bravery of Jaap Penraat, a Dutchman who risked his life to fight evil and save Jews during the Holocaust, is recorded in this wonderful book, written and illustrated by prolific author Hudson Talbott. Intended for ages 10-14, although interesting for adults as well!

• Friend or Foe?, by Eva Vogiel, The Judaica Press, Inc., $33.95, HC.

A suspenseful novel set in London, England, at an Orthodox Jewish boarding school for girls a few years after the end of World War II. Ages 10-14.

• Gershon's Monster, retold by Eric A. Kimmel. Scholastic Press, $22.99, HC.

One of the earliest and most beautiful Chassidic legends. A High Holy Day story that can be read to the very young but whose profound meaning can be understood at a deeper level for older children and even adults. Lovely illustrations by Jon J. Muth.

Recommended Reading, which appears monthly, is prepared by Atara Beck of Israel's Judaica Centre.

1/2 onion, finely chopped	1/2 tsp fresh rosemary, chopped
1/4 cup ketchup	1 tsp salt

Preheat oven to 350°F. Spray 2 loaf pans with cooking spray. In a pot, combine cranberry sauce and brown sugar. Heat, mixing well. In a bowl, combine the rest of the ingredients and mix well. Pour meatloaf mixture into loaf pans. Brush loaves with cranberry mixture and bake 1 hr. Allow loaves to rest for 5-10 mins. before slicing. After slicing, brush with more cranberry mixture and serve.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I just got back from sleepover camp. I had the greatest summer of my life, and I'm having trouble adjusting back to my life here. My friends at camp are different then my friends at home. I'm kind of nervous to see my home friends. I'm also scared that people may have changed over the summer, and it may be different with them now. I miss my camp friends so much. What do I do?

Camp Sick

Dear Camp Sick,

It is completely normal to miss your camp friends so much right now, especially after sharing such a wonderful summer with them. You are very lucky that you feel so close and so connected to all of them. Coming home from camp, it is often very hard to get back into your normal routine. Often people have trouble adjusting home after coming back from summer vacation. You just have to remember that like there are wonderful things and people for you at camp, there are special things for you at home too.

If you felt close to your home friends once before, it's likely that you will feel close to them again soon. You probably just need to spend time with them and then you will realize how much you love them.

If this is not the case though, and your friends did change during the summer, then you will always have the love and support of your camp friends, and then when you get to see them, it will be that much more special. You also have a perfect opportunity to make new friends this year. So don't limit yourself, if you aren't getting along with some people, jump on this opportunity to meet new wonderful friends.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

ISRAEL IS CALLING.
THE CHALLENGE FUND IS ANSWERING THE CALL.

Now your gift goes farther on Israel's behalf

This year, the UJA Federation Challenge Fund will help your gift multiply to benefit the people of Israel. The Challenge Fund, established through the heartfelt generosity of families listed below and others who are now stepping forward will match every gift increase dollar for dollar. That way your additional UJA Federation donation will double to provide programs for those hardest hit by the Israeli government's transfer of funds from vital services to increased security costs. So please give generously to help Israel during these difficult days. Israel is calling. It's time to answer.

UJA Federation proudly salutes the outstanding leadership and commitment of all those who to date have contributed generously to the Campaign 2002 Challenge Fund.

Without volunteers, a cold, harsh community

My grandmother came to Canada from Ukraine in the mid-1920s. Although she lived here for the rest of her life, raised children, and helped run a business, she never learned to speak very much English.

Nevertheless, she used to make the rounds to the neighbours, many of whom were non-Jewish, selling flowers she had grown herself, to raise money for various charities and fill blue boxes for the Jewish National Fund. She did very well, too, although we could never quite figure out how she communicated.

She was not unique. Many of our parents and grandparents did the same kinds of things, because performing chesed – acts of kindness – and giving tzedakah were such an integral part of their very being that to act otherwise was unthinkable.

While volunteer opportunities in 2001 may be different, the point is the same – to do good for others without expecting compensation other than personal satisfaction.

It is difficult to imagine what the community would be like without voluntary assistance. Historically, there probably would be no Mount Sinai Hospital, no Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, no Jewish Family and Child Service. Much less money would have been raised for local and Israeli causes.

Could there be meals on wheels, big brother or sister programs, concerts for the elderly, ongoing comfort for the terminally ill or even school trips without people willing to give up some of their precious time?

One of the warnings given by those worried about the movement of women into the paid workforce was that their volunteering would stop, or at least be drastically reduced.

This has not been the case.

The United Nations has recognized the tremendous contribution of the volunteer sector by designating 2001 as International Year of the Volunteer. The CJN salutes this step, and offers its own by dedicating this year's Community Focus supplement to volunteers, acknowledging the cold, harsh world we would have without them.

Cutbacks increase the demand for volunteers

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Volunteers are desperately needed in part because the impact of government cutbacks is being felt, say the volunteer co-ordinators of four major Jewish service organizations.

"We're in need of volunteers – badly," said Andrea Pines of Jewish Family and Child Service, which offers a variety of programs for children, youth and adults.

"We are most in need of volunteers for the Big Brother/Big Sister program, and then we need drivers to take children in foster homes to appointments and activities," Pines said, adding that volunteers are also needed to tutor school-aged students, visit isolated people in their homes and work in their Just a Second shop.

Gayle Zack of Circle of Care, which caters mainly to Jewish seniors in need, says that the organization's client base is growing, and its volunteer base is aging, with most of their volunteers in their 60s or 70s.

"We're always in need of volunteers," says Zack. "Our need for volunteers is especially great in winter because our volunteers go away to Florida or don't want to drive."

Circle of Care has close to 500 people who give of their time, making deliveries for the kosher meals on wheels program, or taking part in the friendly visiting, hospice service, and escort and transportation service programs.

The need for volunteers is related to government cutbacks, which in turn has caused many of these service organizations to expand their programs in order to accommodate the increasing demand for them.

"[In a nutshell] the government has been cutting back drastically for the last few years and now they are giving us back only a small percentage of what was taken," said Arlene Margolese, manager of volunteer services and Judaic programming at Reena, which services people with developmental disabilities.

"That sum is being spread around to all [service organizations] – the government is not properly filling in the cracks."

As a result, she says, Reena has had to utilize volunteers in different ways.

"Volunteers don't take the place of staff, but they are there to help them," said Margolese.

Barbara Zigler of the Bernard Betel Centre, a multipurpose, multicultural recreational, educational and wellness centre for seniors, says that the facility has come to rely more on volunteers over the years, especially for their respite and visiting programs.

"Government cutbacks have meant that there is more of a need for these programs because many people who might otherwise have remained in [medical] facilities are finding themselves back in their homes," she says.

These organizations, which have started accepting volunteers as young as 16 years old, recruit volunteers by placing ads in newspapers, by word of mouth and by making contact with synagogues and schools in the community.

Training is provided by each organization, though the type depends on the area to which they've been assigned.

"We're looking for volunteers that care about supporting other people and can give us just a couple hours of their time," says Zack. "It's not the age but the empathy that's important in a volunteer."

Volunteers enrich the lives of Reena clients.

Jewish foster parents fill urgent need

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Adrienne Smith struggles to find the words to explain what it means to her to be a foster parent. To explain why she took in her first foster child when she had chronic fatigue syndrome and two teenagers of her own. And why she continues to foster now that her son and daughter are in their 20s.

"I wish there were words to tell people what you get out of fostering," said the longtime single mother, whose name – like those of other foster family members mentioned in this article – has been changed to protect the privacy of the foster children. "To be part of a young person's life and to contribute to their well-being and growing up – it's incredible, it's like an adventure, and it's a sense of accomplishment."

Smith, who took her son's friend into her home as her first foster child at his (her foster son's) request, is not satisfied that she has conveyed her feelings exactly until she comes up with one more word: "Nachas!"

Gordon Wolfe, executive director of Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS), and Selma Elzas, the agency's foster care co-ordinator, wish there were more people who felt like Smith.

"There's an urgent need for foster parents," said Wolfe in an interview at JF&CS's main office on Bathurst Street.

At this year's JF&CS annual meeting, which honoured the agency's foster parents, Wolfe outlined some of the reasons for what he termed a "foster care crisis" in Ontario, particularly in urban centres. There are more women in the workforce, he noted, as well as fallout from a rising divorce rate (children's behavioural problems and complicated family relationships); increased reporting of abuse; a trend to marrying later or not at all; and a growing number of adult children who care for aging parents.

Currently JF&CS has 100 children in care, 30 to 35 of whom are in foster homes. There are only 31 Jewish foster homes, not all of which are or can be filled all the time. Not all children, it should be noted, are candidates for foster homes; some are in treatment centres or group homes.

In recent years, Wolfe has seen an increase in the number of children removed from their natural homes and put in the legal care of the agency.

Even if there are openings in existing foster homes, however, there may be restrictions regarding the age or gender of the children who can be taken in.

"It's like a square peg in a round hole," said Wolfe. "That's why sometimes it verges on a crisis."

When there are no foster parents who can take an additional foster child, the agency can access temporary emergency foster homes, but a time limit on the child's stay means an additional move, which is not a preferred option.

Barring one exception that Wolfe could recall, in his experience over the past 20 years since he joined JF&CS, Jewish foster children in the Toronto area have been placed in foster homes exclusively within the Jewish community.

Non-Jewish "treatment" homes are very respectful of the fact that the agency and the youngsters are Jewish, including allowing for special requirements such as kashrut, he said.

Being able to put Jewish children in Jewish foster homes was one of the main reasons behind the agency's becoming a registered children's aid society in 1980, Wolfe explained. To the best of his knowledge, it is the only Jewish one in North America.

The process of becoming a foster parent takes three to four months and begins with an information meeting. There is no obligation to continue after the meeting, said Elsaz.

Applicants require three references, a medical, a home safety inspection, a home study including interviews with everyone in the home over age six, a seven-week Children's Aid Society training program (one night a week), and a criminal record check for everyone in the home over 18.

Foster parents don't need to be married couples, Elzas noted. "We have single women who are not parents, single women who have children, couples who don't have their own children, couples who do." At the time of the interview, an application from a single man was being processed.

Smith, speculating on the common characteristics of foster parents, said the only thing she could come up with was that they all enjoy spending time with young people. "We come from all socio-economic backgrounds, and have different interests."

Training covers areas such as the role of the foster parent and the JF&CS team, the role of the foster parent (if any) with the natural family, separation and attachment issues, and working with backgrounds of abuse.

But one of the best things to come out of it is contact with other foster parents, said Smith, 50, who has been divorced since her children were young.

Sarah and Michael Schwartz are longtime foster parents who took in children on an informal basis before they became affiliated with JF&CS.

The couple's involvement in fostering began in the late 1970s with a teenage babysitter who was interested in becoming more religious and had spent Shabbat and holidays with the observant couple and their young children.

After Sarah and Michael met with her parents, the adults agreed on an informal arrangement that lasted two years.

A friend of a friend initiated the next arrangement, and it wasn't long before the Schwartzes were looking after a youngster in whose case JF&CS became involved, leading to more formal fostering, mostly on a short-term basis.

Although there is a religious aspect to their involvement – the mitzvah of chesed – the couple, now both in their 50s, have "always had an open-door policy," said Sarah. Coincidentally, her explanation was interrupted mid-interview by a phone call from a friend asking whether she could house guests for a simchah.

Do they ever say no? "We've said no to teenage girls because we have young men in the house," said Michael, who works in the computer industry.

Before the parents of four grown boys agree to take in any foster child, however, they Dreading the High Holy Days: Must we go to shul?

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Opinion

I dread the High Holy Days. As they approach, every year, I experience a churning sensation in my stomach and I feel my lip begin to curl, as if I'm in the midst of an Elvis impersonation. I recall having to hunt for a new jacket-and-skirt suit (though a pant suit would be much more practical for year-round use), and then walking to synagogue in my high heels (and we might as well walk because it seems that unless you get to shul at the crack of dawn you can't get a parking spot anywhere near the entrance doors).

Then there's the service itself. My family and I usually sit in one of the basement services, as we are not members of the local synagogue. All the chairs are linked together, so when you're ushered into the room at an "appropriate" time, you feel as if you could be sitting down to watch a baseball game, minus the peanut shells on the ceramic floor. But you have a ticket in your hand, which you paid for and admits you into the shul.

So you're finally in your seat and you can't help but focus on how stuffy, cramped and crowded it is. Then your stockings begin to itch, and instead of reflecting on your past sins, praying for forgiveness and repenting so as to be included in God's good book, you realize that instead, you're reflecting on the sins you must have committed to cause you to be sitting in this service, and you're praying that your parents are just as uncomfortable as you are and that they'll want to leave soon too.

The prayers are recited in Hebrew, a language I can read at a snail's pace but cannot understand, and the rabbi's sermon usually is irrelevant to my life and drags on endlessly, putting half the congregants to sleep.

The point is that the High Holy Days, which are perhaps the most significant days on the Jewish calendar, are a time for introspection and sincere repentance. All humankind stands in judgment before God. We ask Him to forgive our transgressions and inscribe us in the Book of Life for another year.

Yet at a time laden with such importance, I am ashamed to admit that I am unable to find the kind of spiritual atmosphere in a synagogue that would enable me to reflect and repent.

I spoke to the cantor of a large synagogue in the community who admitted that "it's a challenge to create a spiritual environment and meaningful experience for congregants" during the High Holy Days.

In addition to using "crowd control," having a choir and cantor to enhance the beauty of prayers and asking for the participation of congregants in singing the prayers, he said congregants are also responsible for how much spirituality they derive from services. Those who are educated in religion and attend synagogue regularly are more likely to have a more positive experience.

Yet for those of us who are uneducated in the area and are unable to read quickly enough and sing along with the rabbi and cantor, the service is practically hollow.

"The service is the experience. It is not a time for education," the cantor continued, suggesting that I read the English translation of the prayers or peruse the text in advance.

"You can't just expect to go into the service and have it be meaningful [otherwise]."

To counterbalance these disheartening, hopeless comments, I spoke to the associate rabbi at the Village Shul. He had a different, more optimistic view, on the High Holy Day services. "We offer three options in terms of services. We have an abridged interactive service, a traditional service, and a classes and discussions service."

He assured me that it is the goal of his synagogue to make the experience relevant and practical to people, and to present tradition in a way that is meaningful to different age groups. For instance, a service for young professionals will provide a sermon geared to the experiences of that group. A service for parents will offer insights into parenting, marriage and other such relevant themes.

Indeed, this was an intriguing prospect for me, but not all Jews can fit into one synagogue. Thus the question, which I am sure lingers in the minds of many other Jews as it does mine, needs to be asked aloud: If a synagogue setting lacks the spirituality that is required to pray, is it necessary to go to shul? If we don't go and choose to pray in another setting, such as in the serene outdoors or even in a quiet room of the house, should we feel guilty? Should we worry that God will frown upon us if we fail to enjoy and attend synagogue? Are we tempting him to inscribe us dissidents in the bad book?

This is the dilemma I face every year and it is the guilt invoked by simply asking the question that makes my stomach churn.

The only answer to this enigma of soul-searching magnitude is that there is no answer. Each of us must find a personal resolution.

As for me, I'm not yet completely sure that I have the courage to abandon institutionalized religion. This year, I might just decide to join that interactive service. In fact, for once, I'm looking forward to it.

Federation keeps pace with population growth

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Jewish community in the Greater Toronto Area is no longer just a large community, but the fourth- or fifth-largest in North America.

The resulting social and economic implications – from both increased immigration and people moving here from other Canadian communities – provide new challenges for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Alan Sandler, who will complete his term as federation president in September, discussed some of the issues in a recent interview at his Toronto accounting office.

In addition to the ambitious Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) program launched last year to oversee the development of three local Jewish "campuses," institutions like schools and synagogues are now expanding rather than just maintaining their buildings, because of the growth of the community to approximately 200,000 people, Sandler explained. "This is the generation that will have to come up with big dollars," he said, comparing the growth now to that of the 1950s.

"Everyone's going to be on capital campaigns. If we do not have endowment funds to maintain the buildings [in the future], we'll be in trouble. You have to provide for your maintenance, otherwise you're leaving a tremendous burden to the next generation. What is crucial is that money is set aside."

Endowment funds have grown to slightly more than $93 million, while core services and overseas allocations are met by the central UJA Federation campaign, which raised more than $43 million this past year.

Sandler noted that programming is as important as maintenance. Major donors will have to be involved in projects, he said, citing the JTT partnership between agencies, schools, donors and the federation as an example. A lay management team with expertise related to the project is also key, he noted.

Under the JTT umbrella, a 50-acre lot was purchased on the southwest corner of Bathurst Street and Weldrick Avenue in Richmond Hill. The site, which is still subject to zoning approval, is envisioned as offering a range of recreational and educational facilities as well as a community centre.

Farther south, the Lipa Green/Bathurst Jewish Centre site will serve as another campus, while two projects will anchor the downtown campus: the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the corner of Harbord and Huron Streets, and the Bloor JCC, which is being expanded and redeveloped as the Miles S. Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

Alan Sandler

The growth of the community and the magnitude of JTT triggered the decision earlier this summer to restructure the federation's governing body to eliminate micro-managing at the board level. It is hoped that people who "were never prepared to step forward because of the time commitment" will now be able to do so because of the streamlining of operations.

Among the changes was the elimination of the 40-member board of governors. When Sandler's two-year term is up next month (it was extended from June because of the restructuring), his successor will bear the title chairman of the board. Allan Reitzes, the federation's executive director, will be known as the president.

Aside from finances and the running of the federation, other issues concerning Sandler include an "astounding" level of ignorance about Israel, particularly among teens and young adults. "If we have a well-educated Jewish population, that will go a long way in allowing political debates at campuses. If they're knowledgeable, they can answer the questions. Our biggest challenge is how to get that information across… We have a real job ahead to make sure our history's not lost."

He also expressed deep concern about ensuring that Israelis feel solidarity from Diaspora Jews. "That is critical for us as a community," said Sandler, who led a mission to Israel earlier this summer. He noted that possible ways to achieve a feeling of solidarity include trips to Israel and penpal programs for students.

And here in Toronto, Sandler – who immigrated from South Africa 26 years ago – said it's particularly important to work towards a Jewish community that "brings into its tent" all its diverse components. He mentioned in particular the Russian and Israeli communities, as well as the Jewish poor and unaffiliated Jews in general.

YUVAL VAGNER: INNER STRENGTH

While Yuval Vagner (age 21), was training with his attack helicopter squadron his aircraft experienced severe vibrations, making it impossible to control. The helicopter crashed, tragically leaving Yuval a quadriplegic. Ironically, thirty years earlier, Yuval's father was left paralyzed in a command car accident.

Simple needs suddenly became extremely complicated. Eating by himself took long months in rehabilitation to achieve. Writing eventually became possible with the use of a special glove. Yuval found the need for constant help the most difficult part of his new reality.

Today, Yuval considers himself extremely lucky to be alive. Together with the incredible support at Beit Halochem, the strength of his parents, wife Yael, close friends and his own determination and inner strength, Yuval leads a productive life.

Yuval says that despite being quadriplegic, he appreciates every breath, good meal and happy occasion. More than anything, he appreciates all that Beit Halochem has done for him.

Volunteers are an integral part of school day

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

While some high schools have recently added community time to student curricula, parent volunteers have long contributed willingly to the school environment.

From monitoring pizza sales, supervising class outings and organizing major fund-raisers, to sitting on boards and participating in school governance, parents are involved in almost every facet of the educational arena.

While men are active in fund-raising and aspects of school governance, women tend to be involved in almost every aspect of the school, said Prof. Agnes Meinhard, founder and director of the centre for Voluntary Sector Studies at Ryerson University.

Historically, volunteering was a way for women to get involved in the public domain. Skills were acquired that they could later use in other aspects of their lives. In fact, many women who became successful in politics developed their skills from volunteering, Meinhard noted.

"The motivation for volunteering specifically in schools seems to be driven by a desire by women to do what is best for their kids," she added.

Over the years, Joseph and Toby Tanenbaum have contributed financially to numerous organizations, including the Canadian Opera Company, the Canadian Psychiatric Research Foundation and the Gallery of Byzantine Art at the Royal Ontario Museum.

In the early '60s, Toby was a volunteer at the Associated Hebrew Day Schools, where her children attended school.

At that time, Toby said, "while my husband was out there building [his business], I was there to support my children – to help them with their projects, nurse them when they were sick."

By volunteering in the library at Associated, she said she learned skills which came in handy later when she went to university.

However, Toby said, "When my children were young, I volunteered [in the library and on the board] in order to support [them]. I felt that it was another way for me to nurture them.

"Volunteering in their schools fulfilled a need for me – of being important to my kids... In a way, it was more important for me than for my children."

Student council chocolate sale fund raiser at Associated, helped by a volunteer parent.

Once a volunteer at the Hamilton Hebrew Academy where her children attended school, Meinhard noted that as women have entered the workforce, their time spent volunteering has declined.

Today, 52 percent of Canadian women volunteer – many of them in their children's schools.

However, now you find that women who were working before they had children are volunteering in schools as a way, once again, to re-enter the public domain, Meinhard said.

"But this time, it isn't a way for them to develop skills, but to share skills."

Many non-profit organizations wouldn't be able to function effectively without their volunteers, and for many schools it has become important to manage these forces with clear policies and strategies, Meinhard said.

"There are three elements of volunteering – recruitment, retention and succession – and different organizations have different problems."

For some organizations where there are many volunteers, it may be difficult for newcomers to begin, especially when you have people sitting in the same positions for long periods of time.

For other schools, the problem is being able to attract committed volunteers.

"What often winds up happening is that the same people are recruited to do more and more."

It's important to recognize that people's needs are different and if volunteers aren't rewarded effectively they will look to work elsewhere, Meinhard said.

In many cases, a professional volunteer coordinator or someone on the school's board can be used to monitor these forces, she added.

At Associated Hebrew Day Schools, entry-level positions are available to give new parents a taste for volunteering, said Michele Michaelov, president of the Parent Teacher Council (PTC), where almost all volunteers are recruited.

Initially, parents can get involved by serving pizza and latkes in the classrooms, organizing teacher's gifts and directing student problems to the right person.

Members of the PTC are appointed by committee, Michaelov said. "The Parent Teacher Council has a voice on the board and participants are school ambassadors. So you want to make sure they share the same vision.

"On the other hand, we do try to promote all points of view by encouraging participation at other levels."

At She'arim Hebrew Day School, volunteers come into the classroom and work actively with the children.

Because She'arim focuses on children with learning disabilities, "it is helpful to have volunteers to ensure a small teacher-student ratio," said Yonah Gerstl, vice-principal of the school.

"While the Parent's League and the board are an integral part of our school, day-to-day volunteers are also vital."

For She'arim, retention, consistency and commitment are important. If volunteers stop suddenly, it is very difficult for the children, Gerstl said.

"Ideally, we would like to see all our volunteers take a course in the teaching methods used in our school," she said, especially since some volunteers go on to fill teaching positions as they become available.

"Over the years, volunteers have become more active in She'arim, but not as active as we would like them to be."

In support of the voluntary sector and the United Nations' proclamation that 2001 be the International Year of Volunteers, the Ontario Ministry of Citizenship will recognize more than 6,000 volunteers across the province this year.

Several volunteers from Bialik Hebrew Day School and the Toronto Heschel School have received Ontario Volunteer Service Awards.

Jessica and Graeme Mawson, parents at the Toronto Heschel School, were recipients of the award. Jessica looks after product sales and is co-chair of the environment committee; Graeme is on the school's board and chairs the education committee.

"I wasn't looking for a leadership position," Jessica said in an interview. "For me, volunteering at school is part of my mothering experience. It allows me to spend more time around my children and around the people who care for them."

Lou Kirshenbaum, 83, is a life member of the board at Bialik Hebrew Day School and one of the recipients of the provincial volunteer award.

Kirshenbaum's involvement with Bialik began with Camp Kvutza, a labour Zionist camp.

"When they closed the camp in the 1960s I began volunteering in the school, mainly on the administrative side," Kirshenbaum said.

"Why do I volunteer?" Kirshenbaum asks, answering a question with another question.

"I began to volunteer because I believe that Jewish education is important.

"Really, what are we around for if not to contribute and do things."

JIAS - welcome mat of Jewish community

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish Immigrant Aid Services is the welcome mat of the Jewish community, says Mila Voihanski, the director of JIAS Toronto.

"I know of few other immigrant communities that have such a place to turn."

The agency's mandate, she says, is to settle and integrate Jews who are new to the community.

In the past year, JIAS has welcomed more than 4,000 immigrants to the city, 80 percent of whom were born in the former Soviet Union, 11 percent in South America, and nine percent from other countries around the world.

"JIAS makes them feel connected to the community. It lets them know that there is an agency that has their interests at heart," Voihanski says.

The average age of the head of a household in a new immigrant family is 36, she says, and 85 percent have a post-graduate education. "The majority of families have young children, and most adults have some knowledge of Judaism."

They have all heard of JIAS prior to coming to Toronto, and they see it as their entry point to the community, says Voihanski.

JIAS Toronto is also a major consultant to Jewish agencies in the rest of Canada who require assistance in immigration-related matters, she says.

The agency has provided consultation to more than 300 cases in cities across the country including Windsor, Montreal, Ottawa, London, Hamilton, Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton.

As well, it has provided responses to about 1,200 e-mail and letter inquiries from Jews requesting information about life in Canada. JIAS staff have also visited overseas posts in the FSU and Europe to facilitate family reunification.

JIAS defines integration as the "activity that links newcomers to mainstream Jewish and non-Jewish agencies and services."

In the past year, among other things, JIAS staff has made referrals to Jewish Vocational Service and Skills for Change, to the Bathurst Jewish Centre for membership, to local synagogues, to Metro social services, to Jewish day schools, to second hand clothing shops, to health practitioners and to potential employers.

Its youth immigration project was initiated after UJA Federation of Greater Toronto earmarked a $250,000 grant to JIAS.

"After the beating death of Matti Baranovski, people started questioning the lack of programs available to immigrant youth," says Voihanski.

"Teens from 13 to 18 are at a vulnerable age. Immigrant teens, especially, do not feel accepted in general community programs, and if they feel alienated, they will not join. We run programs with Canadian youth, but we want the Russian and Israeli teens to feel safe, secure and comfortable before moving into an integrated setting."

Teen activities this year have included a Sunday drop-in centre, a job club run by Jewish Vocational Services, an art sale, a photo contest, holiday celebrations and a leadership development summer camp run in conjunction with the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education. It has also worked closely with BBYO to create a chapter geared to assist immigrant teens to integrate with existing chapters.

"At that age, teens do not initially trust us, and we have to build up that trust. They expect us to lecture them, but we really just want to make their life happier.

"When they understand that we want them to feel safe and good, they relax and have a good time," she says.

For adults, JIAS has partnered with National Council of Jewish Women to create a Russian Jewish chapter of NCJW, has worked with other Jewish community agencies to assist them in accessing the immigrant community to make their services available to them, and has placed ads in the immigrant media to educate newcomers about community resources.

It also holds support groups, community information sessions for Jewish day schools, festival celebrations, and runs a Web site [www.jewishtoronto.net/jias].

On behalf of United Israel Appeal Federations Canada, JIAS administers a financial assistance program. Clients have received supplementary financial assistance for special needs cases, for subsidies to attend the BJC summer day camp, and for students to receive TTC tickets to assist with transportation to language programs.

In any immigrant community, says Voihanski, "there are those who require a period of adjustment and those who require additional support. Generally, however, we deal with a healthy population that needs support during its initial adjustment."

Jewish Hospice program provides palliative care

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The medical prognosis for Miriam Cantor is not very good. Two years ago, Cantor was diagnosed with cancer and chemotherapy was prescribed.

The first round of chemical injections helped her a bit, but not enough to stop the cancer from recurring. The early good news has given way to bad.

Beset by a variety of illnesses, she has turned down further interventionist therapy and is at peace with her fate. A charming woman with an infectious joie de vivre, she can even joke about her condition.

Prior to meeting with The CJN, she provided directions to her apartment. It's a building on a major thoroughfare, she said, right next to the store that sells monuments.

"Very convenient," she quips.

"It looks like you haven't lost your sense of humour," I say.

"It's a saving grace," she responds.

With her courage, humour and charm, Cantor is perhaps a textbook case illustrating the credo often repeated by those involved in palliative care services: It's all about living, not dying.

Palliative care, defined in a June 2000 Senate report as "care aimed at alleviating suffering… rather than curing," is not quite a taboo subject in our death-denying culture, but it is a part of life that most people would prefer not to think about. Nevertheless, it's a reality that is facing more and more members of the Jewish community as the population ages and the great bulge of baby boom children reach the age when they must consider how to care for ailing parents.

In some respects, the Jewish community has been a leader in responding to the issue. It has created a co-ordinated, inter-agency infrastructure to provide quality care for people living out their final days, and to support their families.

The Jewish Hospice Program is a joint project of Jewish Family & Child Service, Circle of Care, Mount Sinai Hospital and the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, each of which provides a component of service. It receives some of its funding from UJA Federation, as well as from the government of Ontario and mostly from private donors.

Social worker Sheila Walker is co-ordinator of the Jewish Hospice Program, the "point man" of the program and the contact person to whom referrals are directed. The Hospice's goal is "to improve the quality of life of people going through this stage and to provide respite for their families," she said.

When the hospice pilot program was conceived about 10 years ago, it was intended only for terminal patients, but its mandate has been expanded to include anybody with a life-threatening illness, Walker said.

In its initial year of operation eight years ago, planners had expected to care for 35 families, but demand for the service proved much greater. By the end of the first year, 70 families were benefitting from the program. Currently, about 100 to 120 families a year join the program, and so far, 726 individuals and families have been served by the Hospice program, Walker said.

What distinguishes Jewish Hospice from other palliative care programs in the broader community is the wide range of service it offers, Walker said. There is a social work component, a Judaic chaplaincy component, medical care and home visits – each provided by an agency member of the Hospice team.

YOUR KIND OF SYNAGOGUE

Don't let anyone tell you all synagogues are alike. Solel, a dynamic Reform Congregation with strong traditional leanings in service and religious practice, has earned a reputation for being particularly welcoming, for our involvement (and especially that of our youth) within the Jewish community and the community at large, for our initiation of/participation in on-going programs for advancement of social justice, for the emphases placed on lifelong Jewish learning (our school is praised by educators in Canada and the U.S., and adults can fill their appetites for learning, everything from B'not Mitzvah to challah baking), for the way in which the children are cherished and continuity is nurtured, and especially for the manner in which we can be counted on to support each other in celebration and sorrow. This is Solel.

In addition we offer the usual and some not so usual benefits of membership:

Services: Friday evenings, Saturday mornings, all Jewish holidays, weekly Minyanim Tuesday 7:00 a.m.

School: Preschool through confirmation.

A dynamic and approachable Rabbi, active Sisterhood and Brotherhood, cemetery rights, High Holiday tickets and services for the hearing impaired.

Helping out at the hospitals

Painting by Canadian Artist Ian Leventhal celebrates the United Nations Year of the Volunteer.

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Volunteers play an integral role in two of Toronto's largest institutions, The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and Mount Sinai Hospital.

Joanne Fine Schwebel, director of volunteer services at Mount Sinai, says that their more than 650 active direct-service volunteers ranging in age from 16 to 93 provided some 114,000 hours of service last year.

Sandy Frankel, co-ordinator of volunteer services at Baycrest, says that some 3,240 volunteers at the Baycrest Centre contributed 123,000 hours of service last year.

Volunteers usually respond to free-service ads in the newspapers, on radio or on television, notes Frankel.

An appointment is then scheduled, an application is completed and at an interview, the volunteer and interviewer discuss the areas available for service and the applicant's interest.

Both Baycrest and Mount Sinai conduct general orientations for volunteers. Site-specific training is carried out by experienced volunteers or by staff supervisors.

Baycrest asks volunteers to attend one of the orientations that are held each month to cover such topics as policies and procedures, wheelchair handling, wandering client policy and dealing with difficult behaviour.

At Baycrest and Mount Sinai, the scope of activities available is extensive, and includes office work, visiting clients, manning the information desk, working on creative arts, helping with chaplaincy, providing clinical assistance, aiding staff and supporting patient care.

Fine Schwebel says that volunteers are also essential in providing information to patients and family members, providing reassurance to anxious patients and providing support to health-care providers so that they can carry out the essential parts of their duties.

The health-care environment has changed over the past few years, she explains. "The new reality is that patients may be faced with lengthy waiting periods due to staff shortages and increased demands on patients.

"[Patients] may become more anxious around their care, and staff may not always be able to spend the amount of time supporting the emotional needs of patients that we have become accustomed to."

Jewish foster parents fill urgent need

always consult with their children (two still live at home).

"I won't sacrifice my family for someone else," said Sarah. "I will ask them, but it's basically a formality."

At one time, they were caring for two babies, and one became sick. To separate the two foster children, who were sharing a room, Sarah "had to kick one son out of his room."

Although her son joked about it, his considered reaction was, "If a Jewish child needs a home, how can I think my room is more important?"

When the Schwartzes were interviewed this summer, there were no foster children living with them, but last fall they took in a nine-month-old boy after having fostered a succession of teenagers.

"He won our hearts," said Sarah, who has a business in her home. (As a rule, preschool children are not placed in homes where both parents work full time.)

"You have to be really good about separating your mind and your heart," said Sarah, discussing her foster toddler and his return to his family. "You have to be loving, but you have to be able to let go, because the child is not yours."

Although not all their foster children have come from observant homes, living in an observant household hasn't been an issue, they said.

Rather, the focus has been on the same "basic parenting rules" they used for their own children – keeping bedrooms neat, obeying curfews, and doing homework before turning on the television.

"We told them right up front, 'This is what we expect of you,'" said Michael.

When children enter foster care, "their whole world has been ripped apart," said Sarah. "I think the [foster] family has to be able to provide a calm, steady kind of environment."

"They need to feel safe," Michael added.

Both agree that foster children need love, and the little ones need cuddles and a soft blanket or toy of their own.

"The challenge," Michael said, "is getting into the kids' heads to understand what it is they really need from us to feel comfortable."

"The physical challenge with babies is getting up at night and functioning the next day," said Sarah. "The rest of it is basic routine – shopping, meals, laundry, baths – like you're bringing up a family."

For Smith, part of the challenge is dealing with what the child has been taught or not taught and trying to modify it – things like not being used to clearing the table.

Smith's approach to discipline is to have "expectations" rather than rules. "I find that kids, once they've settled down, will fulfil those expectations."

One advantage of fostering teens, she noted, is that they are old enough to be left on their own if she needs a break. "I can say I'm taking the dog for a walk."

Her laid-back 10-year-old pet, she finds, has been a distinct advantage – a "wonderful relaxant" – for her teenagers. "She's very empathetic, someone live and non-judgmental. They can talk to her, and hold her."

While there are foster parents who opt out of fostering, the catalyst is not typically burnout, said Elzas. Changing life circumstances – retiring, spending more time with grandchildren – are more common.

Sometimes a family will stop fostering because their own children have difficulty with other kids coming and going, or sometimes they just need a break between foster children.

"If it doesn't work out, be honest," advises Sarah. Although she is disappointed when that happens to her, she accepts that her home "may not be the right place for [a] particular child."

She lauded JF&CS for being available whenever she needed someone to talk to.

"They bend over backwards to give us whatever assistance they can," said Michael, referring to both emotional and practical support, including respite care, school transportation and expenses.

For Lauren Lewis (also a pseudonym), the benefits of being a foster sister far outweigh any negatives. The youngest of five children, Lauren, 14, told The CJN in a phone interview that her parents have been fostering since before she was born, up to four foster children at a time. "It's sort of a way of life for me."

She admitted however, that having non-family members in the home "could feel like an invasion of privacy, because you're sharing your bathroom [and sometimes your bedroom]. It's also weird because being a foster sister means you have a responsibility to be open to them."

That doesn't mean it's "mandatory" to become friends, said Lauren, although in her experience it happens often. "The girl I shared my room with when I was six just came [to visit] last weekend."

Being a foster sibling is "definitely a positive thing, she said. "Just having the company to play a game of cards or whatever, I think is rewarding for both of us."

She estimates her parents have taken in about 20 youngsters a year, sometimes for only a few days at a time.

New foster children are usually given "the talk" by her mother, who makes it clear that she will not tolerate drugs, drinking or lying, and covers issues such as curfews, privileges and letting her know where they'll be if they're going out.

"She makes sure they know the rules and feel comfortable," said Lauren. "I think she's very fair."

Sometimes a foster sibling will sound her out before approaching her mother to ask about staying out late with a boyfriend, for example. Depending on the situation, Lauren might say 'I wouldn't ask,' or, alternatively, 'Go for it.'"

The first few days are usually uncomfortable, Lauren said. "I know they don't want to be there. They might feel like they're not wanted. It's difficult to get used to at first, even though I've been doing this all my life. [But] I really can't think of that many negatives beside the inconvenience."

In an ideal world, you wouldn't need foster parents, said Sarah.

But foster parents can certainly improve the world of some children whose home situation isn't conducive to them staying there.

For one young woman, becoming a foster child meant being exposed for the first time to a normal family, she said in a speech at the JF&CS annual meeting. "I didn't realize how deprived I'd been."

"The bottom line," said Sarah, is that foster parents "are doing a fantastic, phenomenal chesed. I would encourage a lot of other families to think very seriously about becoming foster parents. It can be very rewarding."

Hatzolah reacts quickly in an emergency

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Since its inception in 1998, Hatzoloh Toronto has more than doubled.

Hatzoloh is a voluntary medical organization comprised of 12 dispatchers and 24 responders trained as emergency medical responders (EMR), who bridge the time gap between an emergency call and proper medical intervention.

By complementing the current ambulance system, Hatzoloh provides rapid, high-quality care within minutes to the Jewish community, says Moshe Sigler, part of Hatzoloh's executive committee.

The responders, who have undergone about 180 to 250 hours of training, he says, come from a wide variety of backgrounds, "from car salesmen to lawyers to businessmen.

"The organization is non-transport – it does not have an ambulance – but it acts as a first response. A responder can generally get to an emergency in under three minutes; when it comes to cardiac arrest that could be a matter of life and death," he says.

When a call comes into dispatch, he says, the dispatcher sends out Hatzoloh's first available unit and then calls 911.

"Emergencies are usually life threatening, but recently we helped locate a man who had wandered away," says Moti Seidenfeld, another executive committee member.

He says that they have stayed with children when the parents have to go to the hospital and they have calmed down elderly people who are afraid to go to the hospital.

"We don't just provide medical assistance and then walk away. They remain until the ambulance arrives, and they will even escort people in the ambulance if required. Reponders are all passionate about their work; it is not just a job."

David Stein, a dispatcher and responder who worked for Hatzoloh in New York for eight years, says there is "nothing like the feeling of walking into the house of someone who is not breathing and walking out having helped him.

"The beauty of the whole system is that we put out the call and there are people spread out across the city who are ready to respond. We even have someone in Belle Ewart on Shabbat."

Sigler, who is doing community outreach and fund-raising for the organization, says they are currently receiving about one or two calls a week. "That concerns me because it means people are either not aware of our services, or they are not ready to take the leap.

"We're here to help, and people should take advantage of our services."

Their goal, he says, is to get to the level where they can transport patients to hospital by ambulance themselves, and be able to administer drugs. We want to be able to do whatever ambulances do. "Our short-term goal, however, is to have the best first-response team possible."

Currently, Hatzoloh's area of coverage includes: Eglinton Avenue to Sheppard Avenue and Avenue Road to Dufferin Street, 24 hours a day, seven days a week; Steeles Avenue to Highway 7 and Yonge Street to Dufferin Street, 6 p.m. till morning and 24 hours a day on Shabbat and yamim tovim.

"After we get some new responders we will be able to close the gap between Sheppard and Steeles," says Sigler.

Hatzoloh's emergency number is 416-256-1000 or 1-800-256-1000.

Combatting missionary efforts

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Jews are being converted to Christianity at an alarming rate, warns Rabbi Michael Skobac director of education and counselling at Toronto's countermissionary organization, Jews for Judaism.

Not only have missionary tactics become more deceptive, Rabbi Skobac says, but there is also a spiritual hole in the Jewish community that makes Jews more vulnerable to conversion.

"This is a serious community issue we're facing," he says. "We're losing so many Jewish people to non-practice, assimilation, intermarriage and conversion... Christian missionaries are only successful because there is a vacuum."

According to studies done for the organization, Jews are being aggressively targeted for conversion mainly by evangelical Protestants or born-again Christians, who believe that in order for Jesus to return, the Jewish people must first convert to Christianity.

The success of these organizations, such as Jews for Jesus, has become shockingly evident in the last 30 to 40 years.

"In 1970, there were about 15 [messianic Jewish] congregations. Now there are over 400. In 1970, there were no [messianic] day schools. Now there are dozens across North America," he says, citing Melach Israel Academy in Toronto as one such school.

Rabbi Skobac estimates that there are more than 900 different missionary groups worldwide that spend roughly $300 million to convert Jews. He says that in 1998, some 250,000 million Jews worldwide considered themselves Hebrew-Christians.

In response, Jews for Judaism, established in 1984, has expanded, and now has offices in American cities including New York, Baltimore and Los Angeles, and in Johannesburg, South Africa. The organization, which is also the only full-time resource centre in the world that works to monitor and combat Christian missionary efforts, also has a network in Israel, Australia, Europe and the former Soviet Union.

Rabbi Skobac ascribes the success of missionaries, in part, to what he calls the deceptive techniques they use to convert Jews.

Services take place in what are actually churches, but Rabbi Skobac says many use overtly Jewish symbols to disguise their true nature, and the cross and Jesus are never shown.

Jesus is referred to as Yeshua Hamashiach, while the baptism ritual is called a mikvah service. Shabbat services are led by a messianic rabbi, and converts wear kippot and tallitot.

Converts even take part in the celebration of Jewish holidays, such as Passover, though the meanings of Jewish symbols are transformed and given Christian meanings.

"We celebrate Passover to remember that Jews were freed from Egypt," says Rabbi Skobac, "but messianic Jews believe that Jesus was the paschal lamb, and that God killed Jesus to make people free from their sins."

The three matzahs are said to represent the Holy Trinity, while the broken middle matzah represents the broken body of Christ. The holes in the matzah are said to signify the wounds Christ suffered during crucifixion, and wine represents his blood.

"What they're doing is committing fraud! They go through every Jewish holiday and reinterpret it with a Christian spin," says Rabbi Skobac.

"Missionaries use euphemisms as a way of overcoming resistance and negativity.

"This is a deliberate attempt to present the movement in a way that is less offensive to Jewish ears. It is done deliberately to make Christianity more palatable. They've reformatted everything to make Jews feel less uncomfortable and guilty about converting."

Though converts are convinced that they will not lose their Jewish identity and that they are not complete as Jews until they accept Christ as the messiah, in actuality, these converts are abandoning Judaism, Israel and the Jewish people, Rabbi Skobac says.

But the primary problem is not the claims missionaries make, but the spiritual vacuum in the Jewish community, he says.

"Many Jews are vulnerable because they don't have a healthy, vibrant community and schools that make Judaism a joyous, passionately spiritual experience.

"Synagogues need improvement – there's not a lot of passion in the services today.

"We need to transform our homes and do Jewish things together regularly. Families need to have Shabbat together, sing Shabbat songs, study the Torah and discuss Jewish ideas – Shabbat is not just about lighting candles. Children have to see that the family takes Judaism seriously, and that they love, enjoy and celebrate it."

He says that most Jews are "Jewishly illiterate," and do not have the depth of understanding of Judaism that is needed to counter the claims of missionaries.

"We're trying to be a catalyst for spiritual renaissance in the community," says Rabbi Skobac. "That is why we call our organization Jews for Judaism – because we encourage Jews to embrace Judaism. We use the problem of Christian missionary activity as a wake-up call – it makes people nervous."

He says he hopes Jews will take advantage of the wake-up call and strengthen their connection to their religion.

"The only solution is to embrace Judaism, fall in love with it and make it a central part of our lives."

Jews for Judaism uses dozens of volunteers to get its message across and the warning out. "Volunteers are an important part of helping our organization do the work we do," says Rabbi Skobac.

"Some volunteers work in the office or hand out literature at locations where missionaries are handing out theirs. Some photograph events, while other volunteers try to mobilize the Jewish community to serve as our eyes and ears. Volunteers across the country let us know about missionary activity on the Internet or in their communities."

Certain volunteers, such as those handing out countermissionary literature, must attend a training program where they are informed of what to expect, how to behave and how to respond to inquiries, says Rabbi Skobac.

"Right now we are looking for volunteers more seriously involved on the board, public relations and fund-raising level."

If you are interested in volunteering for Jews for Judaism, call 905-761-0040.

'It's a hard issue for community to deal with'

Circle of Care trains the volunteers who visit Hospice clients; JF&CS's chaplain, Rabbi Ronald Weiss, provides spiritual support; Mount Sinai's Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care provides home visits by medical personnel; and the Baycrest Centre provides beds for patients who can no longer be cared for at home.

Dr. Larry Librach is considered a trailblazer in the field of palliative care. As director of the Temmy Latner Centre, Librach, who has 23 years experience in the field, is one of the province's foremost advocates of care for terminal patients. The centre employs 14 doctors, four social workers, support staff and a chaplain for its 300 Jewish and non-Jewish patients in the old City of Toronto. It also serves a further 200 home care patients in North York, East York, and the City of York.

He estimates the centre provides medical care to about 30 percent of the Jewish Hospice patients. (Patients north of Steeles receive care from doctors from York Region.)

The Jewish community, Librach believes, is somewhat averse to dealing openly with the question of terminal illness. "People don't want to accept the issue of dying, their own mortality," he said. "It's a hard issue for the Jewish community to deal with. There seems to be more secrecy in the Jewish community on this."

He points to an incident years ago when he was negotiating a speaking engagement with a synagogue brotherhood. His request was turned down. "There seemed to be a general avoidance of the topic," he said, even though the Jewish community has an aging population and the issue is not one that is going away.

"Most Canadians want to die at home, but circumstances may prevent that. A majority of people would die at home if they received good support," he said.

Unfortunately hospice programs, like other aspects of the medical delivery system, suffer from financial constraints, he added.

The Senate report, titled Quality End-of-Life Care: The Right of Every Canadian, concluded that end-of-life care "must become an entrenched core value of Canada's health system."

The report also pointed out that few of the recommendations in its 1995 report on the same topic had been implemented. It noted that only "five percent of dying Canadians receive integrated and interdisciplinary palliative care and that the number of institutional palliative care beds has been cut as a result of health care restructuring."

It called on the federal and provincial governments to work together to develop a national strategy for end-of-life care.

Rabbi Bernard Schulman is director of chaplaincy at Mount Sinai Hospital, with substantial experience ministering to terminal patients. Most of his chaplaincy work is conducted within the hospital, occasionally with outpatients. "We give spiritual and religious support, depending on the needs of the patient and family," he said.

In addition to providing for patients' material needs, things such as kosher food, yarmulkes, tfillin, siddurim and Chumashim, the chaplaincy's main efforts go to comfort patients and families in a time of terrible stress. Sometime that may mean talking to a patient, or even singing to them. Other times, it may mean simply sitting quietly with them.

It's not altogether different from working with non-terminal patients, but "with greater intensity," he said. "Patients are scared and the family needs more moral support."

Most patients he deals with are too weak to discuss issues like death and the afterlife, Rabbi Schulman said, but those who have a grounding in Jewish thought are sometimes able to discuss the spiritual issues involved.

Ethical questions on issues like rescuscitation, come up regularly, and Rabbi Schulman provides a halachic perspective. Often the question is not clear cut, such as whether resuscitation could be considered maintaining life or merely prolonging death.

In difficult cases, he often consults with other rabbis, but the general rule he follows is that maintaining life through such interventions as nutrition and hydration is required. The situation becomes more difficult when the patient is close to death and the moral dilemma arises as to how much effort should be undertaken to keep them alive.

He points to a real life example in which a woman was dying and resuscitation was considered no better than a long shot to keep her alive. A psak (religious ruling) was rendered in support of resuscitation. Doctors revived the patient when her heart failed, but three hours later the woman died anyway, Rabbi Schulman recalled.

In centres across the United States, the National Institute for Jewish Hospices (NIJH) provides multi-disciplinary training for people dealing with Jewish terminally ill patients.

With offices in Englewood, N.J., Los Angeles and Boca Raton, Fla., the NIJH stresses the importance of approaching end-of-life issues from a Judaic perspective.

Israel's needy, immigrants welcome used clothes, toys

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Following the death of her father Henry Korenblum 16 years ago, Ellie Korenblum decided to send his clothes to Israel to be distributed to needy people and new immigrants.

She discovered through her family's contacts that there was a great need for good used clothing in Israel. Then, working with a handful of other dedicated volunteers, she arranged for a shipment of clothing to be distributed in Israel.

The volunteers continued accumulating and shipping the clothing, and with the assistance of travellers to Israel and generous individuals, the project continued to grow.

It became evident that to continue as a community-wide project, it would require more volunteers and funds for the packaging, sorting, and transportation of the merchandise.

Korenblum continues to direct the flow of clothing through a designated drop-off location in north Toronto. These are shipped to Rebbitzen Sheindel Weinbach in Jerusalem. The clothing is sold in used clothing stores for a shekel or two. The main shop in Jerusalem is at Panim Meirot 1.

"Rebbitzen Sheindel also welcomes toys such as stuffed animals, since her clients don't have money to buy them for their children," Korenblum says.

The philosophy of these shops, she notes, is not to make the client feel that he or she is getting charity. The rebbitzen now operates three gemachs (an organization or shop that offers goods or services at very low or no cost) called Beged Yad Lyad.

Notices posted in North America and Israel say, "Hand me down, put me in a box, send me to Israel."

Korenblum has received many letters of thanks from the ladies who distribute the clothing.

Rebbitzen Weinbach wrote: "This is a place where a child can come to kindergarten and tell her teacher that she is wearing something new from the gemach, and have the teacher answer, 'So am I.'"

Korenblum notes that she "couldn't do this project without certain key volunteers. These volunteers help sort the donated items.

"I feel privileged to be in a position whereby I am entrusted to send clothing and toys to hundreds of people in Jerusalem and throughout Israel. And I am grateful to be in a position to sponsor the shipping of the clothes."

For more information about donating good used clothing and toys to Israel, contact volunteer, Laura Moll, 905-707-0531. No Shabbat calls, please.

NIJH teaches caregivers to give patients hope

There are specific responses to end-of-life patients within the Jewish tradition, said NIJH executive-director Shirley Lamm. The Bible tells of Abraham, who, when he fell ill, was visited by angels who sat next to him. "That's what we feel we should do," she said.

People at the end of their lives do not want detachment and denial from their family. "People want to be hugged, they want to be touched. They're missing all this warmth," she said.

NIJH also teaches caregivers to give patients hope. "You tell them you hope they have no pain. You hope their children grow in the footsteps of their parents and will be a credit to their name," she said.

Like others in the field, Librach is quick to dispel stereotypes that working in end-of-life care is always a gloomy or negative experience. He prefers to stress the positive and rewarding aspects of palliative care. "We concentrate on living until you die," he said.

Those outside the field are often surprised at how people with terminal illnesses cope with the news that they're going to die. Of course they experience times of depression and pain. But many patients are spurred to live their remaining days to the fullest, she said.

One of her clients described it like having a pole in the middle of the living room. Sometimes you bump into it but other times you live around it, she said.

Focusing on quality of life is the goal of palliative care providers, Walker said.

"People think that dying is all black. It's not only that, but it can be a period of healing and a lot of personal growth. We've seen a lot of miracles."

In the eight years she's headed the Jewish Hospice Program, Walker has witnessed many inspirational moments. In one case, an elderly man was dying and felt too weak to attend his grandson's bar mitzvah. A wheelchair was used to permit him to attend, and he was called for an aliyah. The story was related to a elderly woman at Baycrest, who used the same wheelchair to attend her granddaughter's bat mitzvah. Money for the wheelchair was donated and a plaque placed on it, so today it is known as the "simchah wheelchair," Walker said.

Although many palliative care patients are elderly, Walker recounted the story of a woman in her 40s who was diagnosed with cancer. After a four-year battle with the disease, she was given only three months to live. She was given a morphine pump to relieve her pain and she remained at home with her husband.

Faced with death, the woman told Walker, "I re-established my priorities. I used to be a worrier, but now I only do things that I want to do."

Her husband proved a pillar of strength, teaching himself to be a gourmet cook so that he could provide his wife with the meals she loved.

"The illness brought the couple closer and they didn't waste time on the minor stuff," Walker said. The woman lived for 18 months longer.

Another woman in her 40s, divorced, with one child and both her parents dead, "felt she had been dealt a hard blow," Walker said.

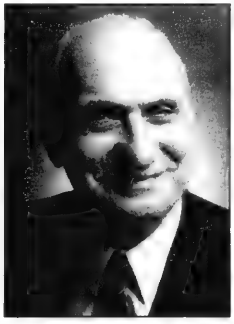
Impossible not to get close to pallative care patients: volunteer

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Ted Waldman has served as a volunteer in the palliative care unit of the Baycrest Hospital for more than 12 years.

"When we were trained to work in palliative care, we were told not too get to close to a patient," says Waldman, who has been involved as a volunteer with the Baycrest Centre for more than 21 years in numerous capacities.



Ted Waldman

"But that is impossible. You develop a close bond with the patient and the family when you visit that person week after week, in many cases for several months."

Palliative care provides for the emotional, spiritual, social and economic needs in the care of patients with terminal illnesses.

Waldman says this work is "especially challenging when you have developed a close friendship with the patient and the patient passes away."

He adds that like the staff who work in this department every day, "I try to accept it and be strong for the next person who needs me."

Waldman has served as president of the Baycrest men's service group, as a member of several advisory committees, as a tour guide, and he and his wife Alma Waldman were honoured several time by Baycrest for their exemplary volunteer services.

Born in England, he served in the Royal Air Force from 1939 to 1945 and saw overseas duty. He immigrated to Canada in 1951 and was employed as a salesman for Abbott of England until his retirement in 1989.

Waldman has made volunteerism into a career. "I found that serving those who need the help of others has made me happier and more successful outside of my individual satisfaction. No one can try to help another person without helping oneself."

He adds that he works with "a wonderful, caring group of volunteers. We have a great rapport and we are very supportive of one another."

Shortly after arriving in Canada, Ted and Alma joined the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation and became active on numerous committees and on the board of governors. Ted served as president of the shul's brotherhood, and Alma was president of the sisterhood.

Waldman says he realized that "the most rewarding things you can do in life are the ones that look like they cannot be done.

"We are told that the life of a person is measured not by what you get but by what you give – that is what volunteering is all about."

Last months proved rewarding

Her last months, however, proved rewarding, as friends and family came to her support, and the music group she once sang with gathered for a special performance in her honour. "Her estranged brother became her best caregiver, bought her food, took her on drives. They became very close," Walker said.

Visiting Jewish Hospice patients on a regular basis is a mitzvah that 32 volunteers from Circle of Care have taken upon themselves. Susan Samila, co-ordinator of hospice volunteers, said they are expected to commit to one visit a week for a minimum of two hours. Some Jewish Hospice clients receive visits from more than one volunteer a week.

"We can always use more volunteers, but there is no waiting. If people need this kind of support, it's always available," she said.

Volunteers provide companionship, give families a break, talk to patients and comfort them. "They are not there to give advice, but to listen to people, to be supportive and be sociable," Samila said.

Occasionally, they may take out the client for a cup of coffee or to a movie.

Volunteers come from all walks of life and social backgrounds, but "I would say they have a special quality, and that's the courage to look at something society doesn't want to confront. It's an admirable strength."

Heather Unikel is a volunteer who visits Miriam Cantor every week. She has been volunteering for the past seven or eight years. Ten years ago, her father died of cancer, but in the last stages of his illness, she found the strength to give him injections and provide strength for others in the family.

She was among the first group of volunteer trainees to learn the basics of key end-of-life issues like the nature of illnesses and medications.

Unikel believes all good volunteers share certain characteristics: They must like people; they must be open to whatever happens; they can't have an agenda of their own; and they can't go into a situation expecting specific results.

"The main thing is not to have an agenda, to say, 'Today, this will happen,'" she said. "My role is to help with whatever is needed that day, to help the person be more content."

Samila tries to match the volunteer with the client, and in Unikel's case, she and Cantor appear to be a good team, although with Cantor's zest, it's hard not to fit in.

She is quite ill, although you'd never know it to look at her. "It's taken me four hours to look this good," she jokes.

Asked how she feels, her quick response is, "with my hands."

Still, she fatigues easily and for every good day she enjoys, there are two or three bad ones.

'Volunteering is giving back to the community'

Frankel says that "volunteering is giving back to the community, but volunteers should receive enjoyment and learn from their experience. Volunteers assist and enhance the program – they are never there to replace staff in any way."

Syrelle Bernstein, director of volunteer service at Baycrest says that "volunteers are available to enhance all services to clients, therefore, enriching the quality of life for the people we serve."

Many volunteers at Mount Sinai, she says, "are grateful [former] patients wanting to give back," or they have been recommended by friends and family.

As well, referrals come from the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and career centres of local colleges and universities.

Bernstein notes that the United Nations declaration of 2001 as the International Year of Volunteers "will highlight the contributions of volunteers. It will provide the opportunity to promote and offer a better place for volunteers to flourish in their volunteer roles.

"It is a time to help the world value the impact that volunteers have on services in the not-for-profit sector."

Louis Bartfield (right), a volunteer at The Baycrest Community Day Centre for Seniors, is seen with Day Centre's members, Rose Milgrom and Stanley Hochman.

'Getting old is not for sissies'

But her spirit is indomitable: "Getting old is not for sissies. You take what the cards deal and get along as best you can."

Although she still lives in her own apartment – her husband, Peter, died a few years ago after 56 years of marriage – Cantor is registered for one of the palliative care beds at Baycrest once she is no longer able to look after herself.

She is pleased with the support she's received from the Jewish Hospice. "I've had a great deal of moral support. It's been very rewarding for me."

Still, the illness has cut into her independence and deprived her of the ability to come and go as she pleases. Although her body is weak, her mind is still sharp. "Thank God my brain is active; nothing else works," she said.

A committed Zionist, she remains very interested in Israeli politics, and she's not averse to inquiring into a reporter's personal life.

"The doctors and social workers tell me I have an incredible attitude, but this is me. What should I do, cry about it? It doesn't help. It's bashert [destiny]. I feel that when you are born, you are given a sentence of death.

"Death can be kind. It can be a friend. Living in pain and torture is worse. There are worse things than dying," Cantor said.

Unikel likewise is philosophical about palliative care and the role of volunteers. "People who want to volunteer shouldn't be frightened by the idea of being with people who are dying. They are alive until they die.

"Don't be afraid. It's nature," Unikel said. "It will bring you a lot of happiness to help someone."

Personal trainer program addresses spiritual issues

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Alan Sless and Evelyn Lazar have begun working with personal trainers, but their goals have nothing to do with physical fitness.

The two members of Beth Tzedec Congregation are part of an innovative pilot project that pairs learners with lay mentors in individually selected areas of Jewish knowledge or practice.

Sless is learning to read Haftorah; Lazar is in the process of kashering her kitchen and becoming familiar with the details involved in hosting a traditional Shabbat dinner.

Evelyn Lazar, left, and her JPT mentor Jackie Kahn discuss the hechsher on a bottle of dishwashing liquid. [Frances Kraft photo]

When Lazar, a mediator for the Ontario Human Rights Commission, saw an ad for the Jewish Personal Trainer (JPT) program in her shul bulletin, she had already begun to make changes in her kitchen.

Although she finds both of Beth Tzedec's rabbis accessible, her interaction with her mentor, Jackie Kahn, is "totally different. A mentor is more an equal."

But having a mentor doesn't mean excluding a rabbi from the process, Lazar noted. "It just provides support."

In fact, it was Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum, originator of the JPT project, who was the catalyst for Lazar's decision. At a presentation on Passover earlier this year, she recalls, the rabbi asked – in the context of remembering Jewish enslavement – whether anyone wanted to do something in their lives, that they felt "stopped" from doing.

Personal trainer program

When Lazar said she'd like to become more observant, Rabbi Tanenbaum asked, "What's stopping you?"

Nothing, she realized. She began by ridding her kitchen of non-kosher foods and replacing them with kosher ones. Her resolve was strengthened when her mother died in May, as she felt the project was a way to honour her memory.

Among other changes, Lazar has set aside new dishes for Shabbat dinners. "My goal for the High Holy Days is to be totally kosher and be able to invite people who don't have somewhere to go."

With Kahn's help, she is finding the transition less intimidating, and agrees that the "personal trainer" aspect of JPT is an apt metaphor. "You can go to the gym all the time, but if you're working with someone, it's easier, less scary."

The hardest part, she said, was making the initial phone call to inquire about the program.

Her partnership with Kahn, a 42-year-old mother of seven, began with a series of phone calls, and they expect to share a Kahn family Shabbat dinner in the near future.

Kahn believes the program — which earlier this year received a STAR (Synagogue Transformation and Renewal) grant – helps bring the 2,900-family synagogue "down to a human level."

Loretta Tanenbaum, co-ordinator of the program, agrees. "It's a very exciting program, a very personal program," she said. "It draws people in one by one, and makes people feel at home one by one."

Although it is still in the pilot stage with eight pairs (and some participants yet to be matched), response has been very positive, reports Tanenbaum, a teacher by training who was hired for the position after her husband initiated the program.

Participants, most of whom are synagogue members, are matched by age, background and interests. "Basically it's matching up people I think will get along," Tanenbaum said.

Applicants are given an extensive questionnaire to identify areas of interest and expertise, but are not expected to know everything. "They can do research together, but they have to start at the point where the trainee is."

Tanenbaum encourages people to sign up as both teachers and learners.

Among the pairs she has matched up is a woman who wants to know how to daven, and a "prayer guide" who will sit with her at services.

Gordon Pape, a 40-year-old architect, intended to sign up as a student, but after he filled in the questionnaire, Tanenbaum asked if he would work with Sless. The two men knew each other from the Little Minyan, an alternative service at Beth Tzedec.

They meet at the synagogue, a convenient location between their two homes. "We've gotten together a few times," said Pape. "It's a little difficult. Sometimes our schedules don't permit it."

But the busy father of two said he aims for "a balance" in his life, including pursuit of Jewish studies and living a Jewish life.

"I really like the idea of the program," he said. "I think anybody who participates in it can only emerge as a winner… If you're teaching something you already know, going over it can only enhance your own abilities, and you also are helping someone else. You get the satisfaction of being a teacher."

For Sless, a 45-year-old lawyer, the program came about at "the right time in my life." He first became involved in synagogue life about four years ago and found he enjoyed it more than he had growing up. He honed his rusty Hebrew skills learning to read Torah with Cantor Tobias Gabriel. When he learned of the JPT program and saw the initial questionnaire, he decided he'd like to learn to read Haftorah.

"I can go at the pace I want to," said Sless, who practises in between sessions. Although he would venture to say the project is important for his soul, "it's something I just enjoy doing."

Unlike the pairs interviewed for this article, some participants are not otherwise involved in synagogue life. The JPT program, however, is "the exact opposite" to most synagogue programs, Rabbi Tanenbaum noted.

"We don't [generally] ask anybody what their personal goals are. Synagogues [more often] create a program and invite people to attend. This takes the whole notion of synagogue programming and turns it on its head."

Sar-El: one way to help Israel

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

With many Canadian organizations here supporting schools, hospitals and other institutions in Israel, there are a variety of ways to volunteer and raise funds for the Jewish State.

The United Jewish Appeal is one of the agencies that cuts across the entire community and supports activities both in Canada and in Israel. Another across-the-community agency is the State of Israel Bonds.

Organizations that provide voluntary hands-on service to Israelis include Beit Halochem Canada, Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, and Dental Volunteers for Israel.

Beit Halochem Canada supports the rehabilitation of thousands of Israeli army veterans, operating four sports, rehabilitation and social centres for veterans and their families in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem and Naharia.

Along with fund-raising activities, Beit Halochem Canada brings in groups of disabled soldiers to Toronto for vacation, where they are hosted by families throughout the community.

Dental Volunteers for Israel provides free dental and preventative care for Jerusalem's Israeli and Arab underprivileged children and for children of new immigrants.

Dentists who give their time and expertise at the clinic are given free apartments for their families. Guided tours, cultural events and other Israeli activities are provided.

One of the lesser known organizations that directly assists Israelis is Canadian Volunteers for Israel (Sar-El).

Sar-El, which is the Hebrew acronym for Sherut l'yisrael (services to Israel), is a non-political organization which provides world Jewry with an opportunity to assist the Israel Defence Forces.

Sar-El began in 1982 in response to the need to alleviate the manpower shortage arising from the Lebanon war. As of 1997, more than 60,000 volunteer slots were filled by 40,000 volunteers.

Most of Sar-El's volunteers work at IDF maintenance bases and live in the same conditions as the soldiers. Their presence substitutes for Israeli reservists. The average length of duty, which is three weeks, can be shortened or extended.

Hebrew lessons, lectures, guided tours and cultural and social activities round out the volunteer's visit.

Len Berk, the organization's president, has volunteered six times. He says that many volunteers return year after year.

"The work we do is necessary," he says. "The time I replaced field medical first-aid kits, it really hit me when some of the used supplies had blood on them."

But, he adds, "just helping Israel with my own hands" is immensely satisfying.

Sar-El is planning a group trip which will leave from Toronto on Oct.14. For more information or to volunteer, call 416-781-6089 or fax 416-785-7687.

Does government funding affect Jewish institutiions?

CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Does accepting government funds affect the Jewish nature of an institution? Does it affect the Jewish values, customs, or religious observance practised by that institution?

This question was posed to Sandy Keshen, executive director of Reena, and Stephen Herbert, president and chief executive officer of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Sandy Keshen

"The government provides us with the same level of funding that other long-term care organizations receive and encourages us to find ways to best meet the needs of the Jewish community we serve, including providing a culturally sensitive environment," says Herbert.

"Our home [for the aged] is a perfect example. We are provided a set level of funding, and with community support, we are able to provide extensive Jewish programming, kosher food, a program to address the needs of Holocaust survivors, religious services and other programs of a Jewish nature."

He notes that the Baycrest Terrace and the Jewish Home for the Aged serve the Jewish community. The Baycrest Hospital is non-sectarian, but the patients are mostly Jewish.

Reena, which was incorporated in 1974 to provide housing and program support to people with developmental disabilities and their families, accepts people of other faiths and cultural backgrounds.

Stephen Herbert

Keshen says its mandate is to "enable people with developmental disabilities to realize their full potential by forming lifelong partnerships with individuals and their families within a framework of Jewish culture and values."

Government funding, which has helped Reena expand and grow, does not take into account the high cost of maintaining kashrut.

"All Reena homes are kosher, and families can be assured that their son or daughter will experience the comfort and familiarity of the Jewish family home environment."

The Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre, which responds to family needs by providing recreational and social programs, enables individuals with developmental disabilities to maintain their Jewish identity in a Jewish environment while participating in programs such as computers, music, arts and crafts, sports or visiting the members' lounge.

She says that the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto "has helped Reena ensure that our Jewish heritage and culture are maintained, providing an annual grant to engage a Judaic consultant."

Keshen notes that a number of members of Reena's board of directors are not Jewish, "yet they are strongly committed to Judaic values of the agency."

She says that some parents of children with developmental disabilities have stated unequivocally that "part of the reason they chose Reena is because of the warm and nurturing Jewish environment that we provide."

Kids can cook too

Many young people really enjoy cooking. When CJN reporter Cynthia Gasner asked several youngsters for some recipes, they were happy to oblige.

Deborah Mechanic is 12 years old, and is a Grade 7 student at Associated Hebrew Middle School, Danilack campus.

"I like to help my mother cook," she said. "Sometimes I create recipes because I like to try new things. I like to use healthy foods and mix them together in new combinations. It's fun."

BROCCOLI/CAULIFLOWER SALAD

1 broccoli, cut into flowerets, and dice the stem
1 cauliflower, cut into flowerets and dice the stem
1 can mandarin oranges
1 diced apple
honey (optional)

Steam broccoli and cauliflower in small amount of water. Remove water. Drain mandarin oranges and keep liquid. Place broccoli, cauliflower, oranges, apples and half of the liquid from the oranges into a bowl. Mix together. Sprinkle with honey to glaze the top.

MANDARIN ORANGE SALAD

1 can mandarin orange segments lettuce
1/4 cup pine nuts (optional)
2 tsp. balsamic vinegar
1/4 tsp. olive oil
2 tsp. mandarin juice.

Strain mandarin oranges, keeping the liquid. Wash lettuce thoroughly and dry. Tear lettuce into bite-size pieces. Put lettuce into a bowl. Add mandarins and pine nuts.

Mix together thoroughly the vinegar, olive oil and mandarin juice. Pour over salad.

ORANGE ROUGHY

6-8 pieces orange roughy
4 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
2 tbsp. olive oil
roasted garlic and pepper seasoning, to taste

Mix vinegar, olive oil and seasoning together. Brush mixture on fish. Bake covered on tin foil pan at 350 for 30 minutes. Remove from oven and add additional seasonings if desired.

Note: you can use sole instead of the orange roughy.

Hanina, a scholar, prophet, healer

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Hanina ben Dosa was a Jewish scholar, a prophet, a healer and a messenger of God.

Many stories of his miracles are contained in the Tractate Ta'anit-Talmud Yerushalmi, Midrashim, and Talmud Bavli.

In a recently published book by Andrew Sanders, Hanina My Son: A Novel of the First Century (Gefen Publishing House: Jerusalem-New York), the author melds material based on scholarly research with invented characters to create a historical novel that takes place from 10 to 110 CE.

Review

In those turbulent times in what is now Eretz Yisrael, the century saw the emergence of two religious developments – the birth of Christianity and the development of rabbinical Judaism.

The book traces the lives of four generations. The narrator is Archinas the Proselyte, Hanina ben Dosa's fictional son-in-law, a wealthy Greek shipping merchant who marries Hanina's daughter.

In the novel, the 101-year-old Archinas spends part of the last three years of his life dictating his memoirs to his granddaughter Michal.

Hanina ben Dosa himself comes from a proselyte family, and most of his life he labours to overcome that perceived disadvantage. Two pivotal questions in this historical novel are, therefore: Where do converts fit into society? and Who is a Jew?

There are striking parallels, in the religious, political and economic spheres, between the events that took place some 2,000 years ago and the events in modern Israel.

Sanders defines the many sects and groups that dominated this period of history – Pharisees and Sadducees, Shammaites and Hillelites, the Roman oppressors, the Zealots and the Nazarene Jews. He also describes loving, binding and loyal relationships in private and public lives.

The protagonist, Hanina, is portrayed as a man who pretends that he knows nothing of politics and religion, yet he subtly suggests ideas to some of the influential leaders of his day.

We witness the development of Judaism's Oral Law, the destruction of the Second Temple, the struggle to establish a modern Judaism, and the conflicts between political rivals – left and right – similar to today's Labour and Likud.

Famous rabbis who appear in the novel include Yohanan ben Zakkai, the only nasi or head of the Sanhedrin who was not a descendant of Hillel; the nasi Shimeon ben Gamaliel; Eliezer ben Hyrkanus; Yehoshua ben Hananiah; Dosa ben Harkinas, Hanina's grandson in the book; and Rabbi Akiva.

They are not portrayed as perfect people or heroes, but are seen as human beings, people who have flaws.

Sanders has researched the Talmud, Roman histories and the work of historians from Josephus Flavius to Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz. He says, "The most important turning points of our people's history occurred in the first century, in Judea and Galilee, in the 15th century, primarily in Spain, and in the 20th century, perhaps with the triple centres of Germany, the United States, and Israel."

The Roman destruction of the Temple not only destroyed Judaism's holiest structure, bringing to an end the use of animal sacrifice, it also placed additional emphasis on the continuity of the Jewish religion based on the Torah and on synagogue-based Judaism.

Sanders told The CJN that there is still a misunderstanding about the origin of Christianity. "I wanted the reader to understand that what the founders of that religion wanted was not essentially different from the Jewish religion."

Sanders was born in Budapest, Hungary, in 1934. He survived the Holocaust in hiding. After the failed revolution of 1956, he managed to escape the Communist regime and came to Canada as a refugee. Educated as a chemist, he worked at the University of Toronto from 1959 to 1966. He established a computer consulting company, which he sold in 1987. This permitted him to pursue his lifetime interest in Jewish history, philosophy and theology.

Other books by Sanders are Dear Maimonides, The Galilean Schism, Hanina My Son, and My Husband, Bar-Kochba, which is awaiting publication.

Sanders and his wife made aliyah to Israel in 1989. He makes his home in Toronto, Canada and Haifa, Israel.

Beth Tikvah Synagogue Demonstrates Commitment To Jewish Education

Toronto (August, 2001) - In a bold new initiative, Beth Tikvah Synagogue has taken dramatic, possibly unprecedented steps, reflecting the significance that this synagogue places on Jewish Education.

Commencing immediately, all members and grandchildren of members (both new and current) have the opportunity of enrolling their children and / or grandchildren (aged 5-7) in The Beth Tikvah Jewish Educational Centre, which functions on Sunday morning only, for a special fee of $180.00. Non-members are certainly welcome to enroll their children in this programme (fee $405.00), designed to provide Jewish children with the Judaic skills, knowledge, values and heritage that parents and grandparents desire to impart to their children.

Furthermore, responding to parental concerns, the Congregation announced that it will provide weekly free, round trip bussing for their school's students (grades 3-7) on Tuesday afternoons, with at least two convenient pick up and drop off points (Bayview & John and Promenade Shopping Centre).

Grades 3-7 meet on Sunday and Tuesday for full sessions, thus meeting the educational requirements of the Conservative movement, without sacrificing the time necessary to provide meaningful Jewish education.

For further information regarding synagogue membership or our educational programme, please contact the school office at 416-221-3433 extension: 312.

APPLE CREPES

½ tsp. sugar
2 eggs
½ tsp. vanilla
1 tsp. flour

Mix ingredients together.

Filling:
1 medium apple, sliced thin
½ tsp. cinnamon
2 tsp. sugar
1 tbsp. corn syrup
honey (optional)
salt, a pinch
1 tbsp. brown sugar
½ tsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. vanilla

Mix all ingredients for apple filling, and let stand for ½ hour.

Take crepe mixture and pour a thin layer into a heated, greased pan and cook until edges are crispy.

Add filling to crepe. Fold over. Continue cooking crepe for another minute. Place on plate and sprinkle with icing sugar, if desired.

Shira Lass, 10, is in Grade 5 at Associated Hebrew Day School Neptune campus. She told The CJN, "I like to cook with my mom. Sometimes I shop with her, and I choose foods that I can use to try to make special dishes. My favourite part is using my hands to mix up foods, like when I make cookies. I would like to take cooking classes designed for children who are kosher."

SHIRA'S SPECIAL BAKED APPLES

8 spy apples
lemon juice
½ cup brown sugar

Filling:
¾ cup flour
1 cup white and brown sugar, combined
⅓ cup margarine
1 tsp. cinnamon

Preheat oven to 325. Wash and core apples. Widen the opening at the top of the apples to form a small cup or well that will hold the filling. Stuff a bit of the cut out pieces into the holes in the apples and press down to form a plug that will keep the stuffing from leaking out the bottom of the apple.

Squeeze a little lemon juice over each apple and stand them in a baking dish with the wide opening at the top. Sprinkle brown sugar over and into the apples. Mix all filling ingredients together in a bowl and rub together until texture is crumbly. Note: not all brands of margarine are the same consistency, so you may need to add a little more flour or margarine to get the crumbly consistency.

Fill all the wells in the tops of the apples with some crumbly topping. Do not press it down too hard – it should remain loose. Sprinkle on more cinnamon if you wish. Bake for 30-40 minutes, until desired doneness.
